AND THEIR TIMES.

BY PATRICK J. P. TYNAN ("NUMBER ONE".)

. . . "He previously had devoted almost all of his time to the writing of his now famous book, in which he so openly and gravely implicates many leaders of the Parnellite Party. . . . I recollect his presenting me with an early copy, and his signing his name to some complimentary lines on the title page. MERE STORIES.

BY

Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD.

Crown 8vo, paper covers.

"Mrs. W. K. Clifford's 'Mere Stories' is not only notable for the excellence and uniform interest of the stories it contains, but also for the novelty of its shape—that of the yellow French novel pure and simple. The innovation deserves encouragement. You do not want, at this time of day, an introduction to Mrs. Clifford's many good qualities. She has become one of those few writers of English fiction no one of whose books one can afford to leave unread."—Review of Reviews.

"In type, make-up, and size, it is exactly the volume to buy at the bookstall and slip into such convenient receptacle as you may chance to carry with you in the railway carriage. It costs you no more than a few illustrated papers, and is more handy to bestow when you have read it. As for the contents, they are eight slight stories, in Mrs. Clifford's best manner. Yet simple and unpretending as they are, they contain the real novelist's touch. There is nature, drama, character in these short histories, and, above all, that command of simple pathos which Mrs. Clifford has more than most writers. We do not know many living writers who could have done either so well."—St. James's Gazette.

UNIFORM WITH "MERE STORIES."

Price 2s.

THE LAST TOUCHES

BY

Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD.

"There is evident in these brilliant trifles the same clearness of style and unconventionality of subject which were justly admired in the more important effort of this author's humorous, if somewhat pessimist, genius."—Athenæum.

"Many of them surpass even 'Annt Anne' and 'Mrs. Keith's Crime' in terseness and brilliant originality."—Morning Post.

"Viewed entirely from the point of view of art, these short stories are well-nigh perfect."—Review of Reviews.

"Much skill is devoted to the narration of all these stories."—Saturday Review.

"One reads them from beginning to end enchanted."—National Review.

"Two or three of the stories reach an uncommon level of thought and expression."—Standard.

"Indeed, in every story there are touches of wonderful cleverness, signs of clear insight, of fresh and just observation."—The Speaker

"They are capital reading."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

HOW TO MAKE AN INCOME-PAYING HOME.

The object of the above Company is to develop the resources of their estate, consisting of about 12,000 acres, situated in the far-famed Tulbagh district in the Western Province of Cape Colony, about 75 miles distant by rail from Cape Town. They are promoting the establishment of a successful colony. The estate has been surveyed and laid out in blocks of about 40 acres each, a number of which have already been sold. The purchase price of this land this year (with all water facilities) is £12 per acre, threequarters of which can remain bearing interest at six per cent. per annum.

In order to provide for the success of every colonist who has sufficient capital at command to be able to enter into this business, but has no practical knowledge of the work, the company have engaged the services of an efficient manager and a skilled horticulturist; and who will, if desired, plant, cultivate, and attend to the development of each client's farm for one year or more.

Thus any settler, provided he gives ordinary attention to the details of the work this company have undertaken for him, can obtain, under the guidance of a skilled specialist, that practical knowledge which is essential in the working to the best advantage of dairy and fruit farms.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.
The Company undertake, if desired, to clear, plant, fence, supervise, and generally manage any holding. They guarantee that 90 per cent. of the trees and vines planted under the supervision of their staff grow to maturity, as specified in the agreement, a copy of which can be obtained on application. The company will manage the estate of any absentee at a charge of £1 a year per acre, and will also undertake to erect on the estate any houses for the residence of a settler, which can be chosen in London before sailing, with estimates given. They further undertake to purchase from a settler, at marketable prices, any approved dairy, farm, and orchard produce.
At the company's headquarters, at Seven Fountains, are the orchard and vineyard belonging to the company, and extensive creameries, packing houses, &c., will be erected as soon as necessary.
Steps are already being taken for the erection of a sugar beet factory, &c., and it is the intention of the company to promote milling and other industries.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.
The Company solicit enquiries from families who are seeking a fresh start in life.
Young gentlemen who are looking for an opening in which to make their way.
Farmers who for years have been losing money in this country and would like to start afresh.
Retired members of the Military, Naval, and Civil Services, desiring to increase their incomes.
The delicate (those inclined to bronchial and pulmonary troubles) who need an avenue for making an income in a congenial climate.
The General Manager of the Company is going out at the beginning of October, and will be pleased to have the Company of any one who desires to avail himself of this opportunity of a fresh start in life in a new field.
All are requested to be good enough to place themselves in communication with the Secretary of the Company—
3, PANCRAS LANE, QUEEN STREET, LONDON, E.C.,
from whom full particulars and papers on all points can be obtained. Also the illustrated book on the subject, price 2s., together with a Manual of Practical Orchard Work at the Cape. Published by the Department of Agriculture of the Cape of Good Hope.

THE HOMACOUSTIC.

WHAT IS THE HOMACOUSTIC?

THE HOMACOUSTIC is a contrivance connected with Speaking Tubes, which entirely supersedes for indoor purposes not only the Telephone, but all other existing arrangements for indoor inter-communication.

THE HOMACOUSTIC
Is Automatic, not Mechanical. Once fixed always in Working Order. Its first cost is its last cost.

WITH THE HOMACOUSTIC
There is no blowing into pipes. The automatic whistle is always in position. One speaks and listens at the same time. The tube is closed when not in actual use. Ordinary speaking tubes can be utilised.

ONE (No. 4) HOMACOUSTIC
Places the speaker in communication with any Number of Rooms.

THE HOMACOUSTIC
Is of special value and inestimable convenience not only in business establishments, but in all Private Houses.

The Homacoustic Saves Time, Temper, and Trouble.

The Largest Order Ever Given For Typewriters WAS AWARDED TO THE

Smith Premier Typewriter

By the UNITED STATES WAR DEPARTMENT.

WASHINGTON, MARCH 27.
The War Department of the United States at Washington desired to purchase 150 typewriters, and established a board of experts to pass upon all the typewriters in competition, and after a thorough examination it was decided that the Smith Premier Typewriter, manufactured at Syracuse, N.Y., was the machine that stood the highest in point of improvements and mechanical construction, consequently the order for 150 typewriters was awarded to the Smith Premier Typewriter Company.—New York World, March 29.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed by the Co-operation of Messrs. Thomas Wilson, Sons, & Co., Limited; Frederick Leyland & Co., Limited; and Furness, Withy & Co., Limited, for the purpose of establishing a first-class line of modern Steamers, to form a regular service for the carriage of passengers and cargo between London and New York, and also to acquire the Furness-Leyland Line between London and Boston.

In order to fully develop the business between London and New York, the Company will have five first-class Steamers working in the Line, of which they have arranged to build two modern high-class Steamers of great carrying capacity, with superior accommodation for about 120 first-class passengers, at a Capital expenditure of about £225,000.

Messrs. Thomas Wilson, Sons, & Co., Limited, Messrs. Frederick Leyland & Co., Limited, and Messrs. Furness, Withy & Co., Limited, are building, at their own cost, three modern similar Steamers, of the highest class, to run in the Company's London and New York Line, giving the Company the agency profits, and thus establishing in connection with the Company's Steamers at the least a regular first-class weekly Line between London and New York.

The Company also acquires the business and assets of the Furness-Leyland Line, Limited, together with the valuable long leasehold premises, 38, Leadenhall-street, London, E.C., held at a ground rent, admirably suited for Shipping Offices, and the goodwill of that Company's well-established trade between Boston and London.

The Company acquires, for the London and Boston trade, the modern Steamers, specially built for the Transatlantic trade, "Georgian" and "Bostonian," built by Messrs. Harland & Wolff, Limited, the "Idaho," built by Messrs. Alex. Stephen & Sons, and the "Cambrian," now in course of construction by Messrs. William Gray & Co., Limited, all suitable for the trade.

By these contracts the Company will have at least a regular weekly service between London and New York for cargo and passengers, and also a regular weekly service between London and Boston.

The outlay of Capital represented by the Steamers to be run in the two Lines by the three Firms represents nearly £400,000, and this Capital outlay is in addition to the £200,000 of Ordinary Share Capital subscribed by the three Firms.

A Registered Mortgage upon the Steamers will be given to the Trustees for the Debenture Stockholders, as well as a floating charge on all other assets, and thus the security of the Debenture Stockholders will consist of the leasehold premises, 38, Leadenhall-street, the Steamers "Georgian," "Idaho," "Bostonian," "Cambrian," valued at, say, £285,000, and two new Steamers, to be specially built at a cost of about £225,000, or, together, say, £510,000, besides a floating charge on the Working Capital.

Messrs. Thomas Wilson, Sons, & Co., Limited, Messrs. Frederick Leyland & Co., Limited, and Messrs. Furness, Withy, & Co., Limited, are the Vendors to the Company, and they have fixed the price to be paid for the goodwill of the Wilson Line, as above mentioned, between London and New York, and for the goodwill, business, and assets of the Furness-Leyland Line, and the four modern Steamers acquired as above, at the sum of £327,500. These are taken over as from 15th October, 1896, from which date the profits will accrue to the Company, which profits the Directors estimate will (when the new boats for the New York and London Line are built and running in the line) provide for ample depreciation, and after paying Debenture and Preference interest leave an ample margin out of which dividends will be payable on the Ordinary Share Capital, none of which is offered to the public, but will be taken by the respective firms interested in the formation of the Company in equal proportions.

The Vendors will pay all expenses of incorporation, advertising, and other expenses, and all commission and brokerage up to and including allotment. No part of the Capital has been underwritten, and there is no promotion money.

For details of the Contracts entered into see full Prospectus.

A Stock Exchange quotation for the Debenture Stock and Preference Shares will be applied for in London and Liverpool.

Draft of the Trust Deed and the Articles of Association will be open to inspection at the Office of the Solicitors to the Company.

Applications for Debenture Stock or Shares should be made on the forms accompanying prospectus, and forwarded to the Company's Bankers.

Prospectuses and forms of Application can be obtained at the Offices of the Company, the Bankers, and of the Brokers to the Company, Messrs. James Capel & Co., 31, Throgmorton-street, London; Messrs. F. W. Bentley & Co., Estate Buildings, Huddersfield; Messrs. E. W. Ingleby & Sons, Hull.

The Subscription List will OPEN on WEDNESDAY, 30th SEPTEMBER, and CLOSE on or before FOUR p.m. on FRIDAY, the 2nd OCTOBER.

PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring from 31st July, 1896, as going concerns, certain Coffee Estates, situated in the protected States of the Malay Peninsula, and comprising about 10,000 acres of land held on leases for 999 years, subject only as regards some portions to the usual clearance conditions.

The Grants and Leases are derived from the Rulers of the various States, and are in each case confirmed by the British Resident.

The lands forming the several Estates to be acquired have been specially and carefully selected with regard to their suitability for the growth of Liberian Coffee, for which the soil and climate of these States have been found eminently suitable, and a portion has been under Coffee cultivation for some 15 years. The area now under Coffee of various ages, as shown by the last cultivation report, aggregates 1,048 acres or thereabouts, of which 538 acres are in full bearing, 108 acres in partial bearing, and 402 acres young plants, which come into bearing in 1897 and 1898.

Further extensions are being put out, and large nurseries are available for future operations.

The crops for the year ended 31st October, 1895, amounted to 3,534 cwt. and those for the current year are estimated at 4,100 cwt., while for 1897 the crop is estimated by Mr. Bailey, a practical Coffee Planter of large experience in the districts, at 5,000 cwt. Mr. Bailey reports as follows:—

"The Estates are all in perfect order, and each one is managed by a good experienced man, visited by the owner, Mr. Hill. Assuming that the Estates are kept in the same state of cultivation for the years 1896-1897, I estimate the crop for 1897 as follows:—

Kamuning	2,000	piculs.
Welds Hill	700	,,
Klang and Evaleen	150	,,
Linsum	1,200	,,
Sliau	175	,,
	4,225	piculs=5,000 cwt.

"Mr. Hill has kept very complete records of the crop on each field of coffee for a number of years, and I have thoroughly gone into them and believe them to be correct, and I believe the above to be an ordinary and fair estimate for the year 1897.

"The Estates are looking healthy and well, and are kept in most excellent condition."

In 1898 a further substantial addition to the crop may be expected, and a progressive increase in subsequent years will accrue, not only through young plants approaching maturity, but from the further extensions above referred to.

The profits of the Estates for the year ended October 31st, 1895, as shown by the accounts, certified by Messrs. Cooper Brothers & Co., amounted to $58,688, equivalent at an exchange of 2s. 2d. to £6,350, and those for the year ending October 31st, 1896, are estimated at $64,074, on the basis of the prices actually obtained from sales to June 30th. At the exchange of 2s. 2½d., the latter sum is equivalent to £7,074 16s. 9d., equal to 6 per cent. on the Preference and 8 per cent. on the Ordinary Capital.

It has been the custom to close the financial year on 31st October, but as the Estates will be taken over as from 31st July, the accounts of the Company to be closed on the 31st October, 1897, will include the working of fifteen months.

Liberian Coffee is in growing demand, and finds a ready sale in the local market of Singapore, where it is largely purchased for America and the Continent. It is also in good demand in the London market.

A small annual revenue is derived from pepper, cocoa, tea, &c.

The total purchase price as fixed by the Vendors is £92,000, of which £72,000 is to be paid in cash, and £20,000 in fully-paid Ordinary Shares, the Vendor paying all expenses in connection with the formation of the Company up to allotment. The balance of £8,000 will be available for the further development of the Estates.

It is proposed to pay the Preferential dividend half-yearly, the first being payable on 1st May, 1897.

Mr. Thomas Heslop Hill, the principal proprietor of the Estates, has consented to undertake the management of the Estates for a period of five years, and the large stake he continues to hold in the property, together with his experience of the districts and as a practical planter, constitute a sound guarantee for efficient management.

Application will be made to the Committee of the Stock Exchange for an official quotation of the Preference Shares.

The following contracts have been entered into:—A contract between Thomas Heslop Hill and Thomas David Traill of the one part and Richard Blamey Magor as Trustee on behalf of the Company for the purchase of the Siliau Coffee Estate, dated 8th September, 1896. A contract between Thomas Heslop Hill of the one part and Messrs. George Williamson & Co. and D. M. Lumsden of the other part, dated 22nd September, 1896, with reference to assisting in the formation of the Company.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained at the offices of the Company, 138, Leadenhall-street, E.C., and from the Bankers, Solicitors, and Brokers.

The above Agreements and also the Draft Agreement mentioned in the Memorandum and Articles of Association and the Articles of Association can be inspected by intending applicants at the offices of Messrs. Sanderson, Holland, Adkin, & Co., 46, Queen Victoria-street.

Applications for Shares should be made on the form accompanying the Prospectus to the Company's Bankers, together with application money, cheques for which should be drawn to their order. If no allotment be made, the deposit will be returned to the applicant in full, and when the number of Shares allotted is less than that applied for, the surplus will be credited in reduction of the further amounts payable on the number of Shares allotted.

London, September 24th, 1896.

The Subscription List Opened at Eleven o'clock on Tuesday, the 29th Sept., and will Close at Three o'clock on Friday, 2nd Oct.

(INCORPORATED UNDER THE COMPANIES ACTS.)

CAPITAL - - - - £120,000,

Divided into 12,000 Five per Cent. Cumulative Preference Shares of £5 each and 12,000 Ordinary Shares of £5 each.

As defined in the articles of association, the Preference Shares rank, as regards capital, in priority to the Ordinary Shares, and enjoy voting powers, and no debentures will be created to rank in priority to the Preference Shares without the consent of the holders of three-fourths thereof. The whole of the Ordinary Shares will be accepted by the vendors in part payment of the purchase money.

ISSUE OF CAPITAL.—12,000 Five per Cent. Cumulative Preference Shares of £5 each, of which the Vendors are prepared to subscribe for one-third (being the largest proportion allowed according to the Stock Exchange regulations), and the issue is now offered for subscription at par, payable as follows:—10s. per Share on Application, £1 10s. per Share on Allotment, and £3 per Share on the 1st December, 1896.

The business will be taken over by the Company as from the 31st March, 1896, and the first dividend on the Preference Shares will be paid on the 15th January, 1897, calculated from dates of the respective payments, and thenceforward quarterly on the 15th April, 15th July, 15th October, and 15th January.

PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed to acquire, carry on, and extend the well-known and old-established business of George and John Nickson & Co., of Liverpool, London, and Manchester, general produce, American and colonial provision merchants, dried fruit, sundry and canned goods merchants, importers and exporters, brokers, and commission merchants, &c.

This business was established in the year 1837, and is now being carried on in the premises Nos. 22, 24, and 26, Stanley-street, and 25, Victoria-street, and at the works, Nos. 87 and 89, Great George-street, Liverpool; also in London and Manchester.

The profits for over twenty years, after providing for all bad and doubtful debts, depreciation of plant and machinery, &c., have averaged over 15 per cent. on the capital employed. The books of the trading for the last four years have been examined by Messrs. Knox & Hassal, of Liverpool, chartered accountants, whose report is as follows:—

Liverpool, 10th August, 1896.

We have examined the balance-sheet of Messrs. George and John Nickson & Co., of Liverpool, as on the thirty-first day of March, 1896, and we certify that after making provision for all bad and doubtful debts, the assets of the firm, irrespective of goodwill, consisting of stock, book debts, cash, &c., fixtures, plant and machinery (the items of fixtures, plant, and machinery standing only at £1,662), show a surplus over the liabilities of upwards of £60,000.

We have examined the books and accounts of the same firm for the four years ended March 31st, 1896, and find that the annual average profits, after providing for all trade charges, and allowing liberally for depreciation in respect of plant and fixtures, amount to £10,538. The figures upon which this calculation is based are as follows:—

Profit for three months to 30th June, 1892	3,068	13	6
Profit for twelve months to 30th June, 1893.....	9,050	3	8
Profit for twelve months to 30th June, 1894.....	12,304	17	5
Profit for twelve months to 30th June, 1895.....	10,487	4	5
Profit for nine months to 31st March, 1896	7,244	3	10
Total for four years.....	£42,155	2	10
Average for one year	£10,538	15	8

We have had submitted to us the balance-sheets of the firm for the twenty years ended 31st December, 1892, and they present a steady and continuous growth of profits year by year at an average rate of over 15 per cent. per annum upon the capital employed.

(Signed) KNOX & HASSAL,
Chartered Accountants.

Taking the average profits as a basis, and allowing for the dividend of 5 per cent. per annum on the £60,000 Preference Shares—say, £3,000—there would remain a large surplus, sufficient to pay 10 per cent. per annum upon the Ordinary Shares, and leave a substantial balance.

The business connections of the firm both at home and abroad are of a valuable character, and include direct and exclusive agencies for the sale of American and colonial produce, canned meats, &c.; also the selling on commission to the wholesale and retail dealers in the United Kingdom of the goods of American, Canadian, and other houses. The firm has also a very extensive, old-established, and increasing connection as dried fruit merchants and commission agents, and this portion of their business is steadily increasing. The trade marks and registered brands of the firm are extensively and favourably known throughout the trade. The firm is represented throughout the greater portion of the United Kingdom by a large staff of travellers and representatives, many of whom have been connected with the house for many years. There are many thousands of accounts open, the export trade for various specialities is extensive, and there is every prospect of a steady and satisfactory increase of the business, for which the capital will amply suffice.

The property to be taken over by the Company as on the 31st March, 1896, consists of the stock-in-trade, book debts, and general assets of the firm, amounting in value (exclusive of the goodwill) to £60,000 over and above the liabilities, which amount the vendors guarantee shall be realised by the Company in respect thereof: the goodwill of the business, the valuable registered trade marks of the firm (nineteen in number), and the fixtures, plant, and machinery at the works, 87 & 89, Great George-street, and at Stanley-street and Victoria-street, Liverpool, which have been maintained in a state of efficiency and all modern improvements added.

The price to be paid by the Company for the purchase of the business, goodwill, stock-in-trade, and general assets of the firm, has been fixed by the vendors at £120,000, to be paid £60,000 in cash, and £60,000 by the allotment of 12,000 Ordinary Shares of £5 each, such shares being issued as fully paid-up.

In order to secure continuity of management the senior partner, Mr. John Nickson, and the other members of the firm, have entered into an agreement dated the 24th day of September, 1896, to act as the joint managing directors of the Company for a period of not less than six years.

The vendors undertake to pay all the expenses of formation of the Company.

The terms of sale are embodied in a contract dated the 24th day of September, 1896, and made between the members of the firm of George and John Nickson & Co., of the one part, and the Company of the other part.

The business will be taken over subject to all existing contracts. These are of the ordinary character, and necessary for the working of the concern, but including as they do numerous contracts with employees, customers, agents, consignors, and others, they cannot be specified. All or any of such contracts may be contracts within the strict interpretation of Section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and applicants for shares will be deemed to have notice of such contracts, and to have waived further compliance with the provisions of such section in respect thereof.

No promotion money has been or will be paid.

It is intended to make application in due course for a quotation of the Preference Shares on the Liverpool Stock Exchange, and to adopt the Provisions of the Forged Transfers Act.

The Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company, the accountants' report, and copies of the agreements referred to above, can be seen by intending applicants at the Offices of the Solicitors to the Company.

Applications for Preference Shares should be made on form accompanying prospectus, and forwarded to the Bankers of the Company, the Bank of Liverpool, Limited, Victoria-street Branch, their Head Office, and Branches, Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie, & Co., Lombard-street, London, E.C., and the London and Midland Bank, Limited, 52, Cornhill, London, E.C., and all its branches, with the amount of the deposit. Where no allotment is made, the deposit will be returned in full, and where the number of shares allotted is less than the number applied for, the balance of the deposit will be applied towards the payment due on allotment, and any excess returned to the applicant. The failure to pay any instalment when due will render previous payments liable to forfeiture.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Preference Shares may be obtained at the Offices of the Company, and of the Bankers, Brokers, Solicitors, and Auditors of the Company.

Champion Extended North No. 1	15 ,,
,, ,, ,, No. 2	12 ,,

On the Champion Extended West a separate reef has been traced, which appears to be trending into the Marlow Lease; the remaining 27 acres Home Rule Lease adjoins the Royal Consolidated Mine, which is south of and next to the Royalist. The reef through the Home Rule property is reported to carry in addition to its uniform value, shoots of rich quartz, in which the Gold is very coarse, and the Directors contemplate floating this as a separate Company later on.

The different leases have been reported on by the following experts:—

D. D. ROSEWARNE, F.G.S. (late Government Inspector of Mines of South Australia).
RICHARD PIPER, M.E.
CHARLES KIGBY, M.E.
CAPTAIN OSBORNE, M.E. (Manager of Champion Reef (Nannine) Gold Mines Company, Limited).
J. FRANCIS MARKES, F.G.S. (Agent in Australia for the Stanley Syndicate, Limited).

All of these reports are of a satisfactory nature, but are too lengthy to quote in full in the Prospectus. The following are extracts therefrom, and the originals can be seen at the Company's Offices.

Mr. ROSEWARNE, in his report on the Champion Extended, dated May, 1895, before development work was commenced on a systematic scale, says:—

"The size of the reef, ranging as it does from 10 feet to 3 feet, and the character of the enclosing rocks are guarantees of its permanence. In your claim, where the trenching is being done at present, there are five feet of solid stone, and it appears to widen out to the South. I need hardly say that small tests in gold mining are not reliable as actual values of the whole line of reef; in the Champion Reef however, the gold is very evenly distributed for a long distance, and in nearly every instance, where opened, good results have been obtained. I say this after a residence on the ground of over a month, and having watched the operations day by day."

CAPTAIN OSBORNE, who has been superintending the work, says in his reports, dated 16th and 17th June, 1896:—

(Champion Extended).—"This Property, consisting of an area covering 63 acres, is situated North of and adjoining the well-known Champion Reef Gold Mine, through which the Champion Reef traverses. In this connection it will be interesting to note that this Reef is so very consistent in its strike—coursing a distance of over a mile without a fault, and it is so well marked by numerous quartz outcroppings the whole length—'that he who runs may read' and mark its true and auriferous character. The Champion Line of Reef harmonizes with its striking appearance, gold being well, and fairly evenly distributed throughout its great length.

(Dennis Shaft).—"This shaft, situated about 80 ft. north of the Champion area, has followed the reef from surface to its present depth, 63 ft. The reef hereabout is 5 ft. wide, a dense body of quartz, free from any admixture of the bordering rock, being in places highly charged with iron pyrites containing free gold, while the pure quartz incloses gold in very appreciable quantity, and is easily detected without the aid of artificial agency. The whole body of the reef is of more than average quality, and gives assurance of permanency."

"A quantity of average stone extracted in sinking treated at the Nannine battery yielded free gold 17 dwt to the ton, while the tailings by assay showed 34 dwt. to the ton, a highly payable result, but I would here point out that the stone now at grass—(over 200 tons)—is, I believe, 100 per cent. better than that above referred to, and is a splendid object lesson indicating what the Champion Reef is capable of when judiciously operated on."

(Home Rule Lease).—"What is known as the Home Rule Reef is a continuation of that operated on in the Royal Consolidated. No more marked or better defined lode is possible, traversing the country rock with unbroken fidelity for at least two miles. Several attempts by miners have been made to develop the Home Rule line, but were always baffled by the influx of water at a shallow depth; the exceedingly rich specimen stone collected by miners and even aboriginals at various times along the whole line seems to me to be a reliable index of what may fairly be anticipated, when systematic development is proceeded with below water level, but which necessitates the introduction of an effective winding, pumping and battery plant."

"The abundant evidence of bold quartz croppings throughout the whole area, proclaims the lode persistent in strike and dip, and there can be no difference of opinion as to its permanency; while at several points the gold seen in the stone (a sample rich in gold forwarded to London lately) assures its auriferous character, and there is very forcible testimony as to the very profitable result awaiting extensive mining operations.

"I believe very strongly that the Home Rule line of Reef will develop one of the most extensive and highly payable Mines in Western Australia."

The Directors whilst not attaching great importance to the assays of picked stone, cannot help referring to the very remarkable results of the above-mentioned samples. They were sent to Messrs. Johnson, Mathey & Co., who assayed them as follows:—

Dunlop Shaft—Weight of Sample, 14 lb.; produce of gold, 750 oz. 7 dwt. per ton of 2,240 lb.

Home Rule—Weight of Sample, 16 lb.; produce of gold, 54 oz. 13 dwt. per ton of 2,240 lb.

A Cable was received from Captain Osborne on the 5th of June, 1896:—"Mine looks splendid; are getting splendid stone." On July 8th he cabled:—"New trench at a depth of 95 ft., water level, good battery stone. Dennis Shaft, at a depth of 90 ft., developed a fine ore body; ore of a fair grade, the reefs show visible gold. The northern boundary of the south drive, the grade is very superior. Home Rule surface workings have opened up a fine body of ore, unlimited, dollying well."

Mr. Markes cabled on the 16th July to the Stanley Syndicate:—"Champion Extended and Home Rule. Private letters Captain Osborne most encouraging—success now assured."

On the 29th of July, Captain Osborne reports by cable:—"Dennis Shaft—have driven along the reef for 12 ft. The reef is 10 ft. wide, shows a fine body of very superior ore. New Trench North Drive, 30 ft.: width not yet determined; good battery stone. Home Rule surface workings, good payable ore."

On the 20th August Captain Osborne reports by cable:—"Dennis Shaft—New Trench consistent in size, production, have opened up a fine body of ore. The reefs show visible gold. Home Rule surface workings most encouraging, expect to start milling on or about to-day."

On the 24th August Captain Osborne reports by cable:—"Dennis Shaft—South Drive, developed a fine ore body, width not yet determined, good battery stone. Now crushing ore. There are 5 shafts in the Mine."

On August 31st Messrs. F. W. Prell & Co. cable reporting that 24 tons of stone taken from five shafts and crushed at a neighbouring battery yielded 75 oz. of retorted gold, without the tailings or concentrates.

It is proposed to erect necessary machinery and to commence operations without delay, as the properties have had all the necessary development work done that is possible without erecting pumping machinery.

The Governor of West Australia (Sir Gerard Smith) at the opening of Parliament, on the 7th July last, stated that the Railway from Mullewa to Cue was being quickly constructed. He also stated that a Bill would be submitted to Parliament this session, authorising the extension of the Railway from Cue to Nannine, for which purpose, he said, funds were already available. This extension will bring the Railway close to the Champion Extended property, and will be invaluable, as it will materially lessen the cost of working the mines.

The Vendor, Mr. A. E. E. Rushall, has fixed the purchase price at £100,000, payable £15,000 in cash, and £60,000 in Shares, and the remainder in cash or Shares at the option of the Directors. The Vendor will pay all expenses of the Company up to allotment, and of the transfer of the property, with the exception of transfer duty and fees.

The following contracts have been made:—(1) Dated September 15th, 1896, between A. E. E. Rushall and the Company; (2) dated September 1st, 1896, between A. E. E. Rushall and W. J. Ruegg. Besides the above-mentioned there are other contracts to which the Company is not a party, made by or on behalf of the Vendor and others, with reference to the formation of the Company and subscriptions to its capital, which may be contracts within the meaning of Section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867.

Applicants can have further information as to these contracts, but in any case will be considered to have had for all purposes full notice of such contracts, and to have agreed with the Company, as Trustee for the Directors and other persons liable, to have waived any fuller compliance with the said section in reference thereto.

Mr. Walter J. Ruegg, one of the Directors, being interested in the sale, will join the Board after allotment.

The full reports and contracts, together with the Memorandum and Articles of Association, may be seen at the Office of the Company's Solicitors.

Application for Shares should be made on the form accompanying prospectus and sent, with the amount payable on application, to the Company's Bankers.

If no Allotment be made the deposit will be returned in full, and if the Shares allotted be less than the number applied for, the surplus of the deposit will be appropriated towards the amount due on Allotment, and the balance (if any) returned.

Prospectuses and forms of application can be obtained at the Offices of the Company and from the Company's Bankers, Solicitors, and Brokers.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 915.—ENGLISH VERSION OF FRENCH STANZAS.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—THE "TRUTH" DOLL AND TOY SHOW.

As considerable doubt appears to exist on the subject, it may be well to explain that the Dolls to be dressed for the Truth Show at Christmas are of two sizes. The smaller-sized Dolls are 12 in. in height, and of these several thousands are still available. The larger Dolls are 39 in. in height, and as their wholesale cost is over half a guinea, it will be obvious that the available supply is more limited. The number on hand is, as a matter of fact, under a hundred, and it will be impossible to obtain more when these are gone, as the Dolls have to be specially made, and the manufacture occupies considerable time. These large Dolls, when dressed, form the most prominent and attractive feature of the Show, and ladies who may wish to assist in dressing them should apply for them as soon as possible, for the reasons given above.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 919.

A considerable number of stanzas which were actually in type had to be omitted last week at the last moment owing to a sudden demand made upon the Puzzle space. The Prize Stanza was, however, included amongst the few which were published, the successful competitor being Birota, to whom a cheque for two guineas will be sent in due course.

The Prize Stanza.

No reader of Truth would disparage
The Bishop, at cycling "au fait,"
Who gave up his horses and carriage
To give what they cost him away.

Methinks that St. Paul such a pastor
Would thus with encouragement greet,
"I wrought with my hands for the Master;
Do thou as good work with thy feet."

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 923.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered this week for

The Best Original Anagram formed out of the Thirty-eight Letters in the words "Abdul Hamid Khan, Sultan of the Ottoman Empire."

In making the anagram, which should be as far as possible of a topical character, all the letters in the given words must be used. Competitors may send in more than one anagram, but all answers must reach me by the morning of Monday, October 12, at the latest.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication, to the Puzzle Editor, Truth Buildings, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on post-cards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand; whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

Answers to Correspondents.

 The real name, with the address, of Eve, winner of Prize No. 914, is Mrs Charlotte Pearsey, 4, Rock Park, Rock Ferry, Cheshire.

The Fishbite.—Your answer has reached me safely.

C. H. Southwell.—I thank you very much for the information you have sent me.

Dot.—I much regret the misprints to which you call attention.

Arch Gibbs.—You interpret the conditions a little too strictly, I think.

Roseland.—Your verse was one of several hundreds that were crowded out.

X. Y. Z.—Quite so; both the texts were sent by you.

J. O'F.—Thanks for your letter.

DESCRIPTION IN RHYMED VERSE OF FAVOURITE WATERING-PLACES.

ILFRACOMBE.

To Ilfracombe I dedicate my lay,
Fairest resort for happy holiday.
Where cliff and cove, washed by the Severn sea,
Join sunny Devon's leafy lane and lea.
Here giant Capstone tempts to giddy height,
While smiling Tors with upward path invite,
And the fair harbour, crowned by Lantern Hill,
May be surveyed at ease by those who will.
The bather's rock-bound pool is soon descried,
Where he may plunge, nor heed the ebbing tide,
And the great bath for swimmers, standing near,
Has salt sea water running fresh and clear.
But those of urban tastes who love a town
Must climb the steep Arcade, and wander down
The High-street, with its shops and glittering wares,
Its rushing traffic and its donkey-chairs.
In the far distance Hangman rears his head,
While field and moorland at his feet are spread.
So go to Devon's fairest Ilfracombe,
Where roses scent the air and myrtles bloom.

Vivia.

WESTWARD HO!

"World without end," far as the eye can see
That roams it in a dumb felicity,
Cleaves with the swallow the divine abyss
Where sound meets silence in a rapturous kiss,
As proudly rolling o'er the yellow sand,
Old ocean, like a lover, leaps to land;
And the blest wanderer, afoot in Devon,
Soars to the very vestibule of Heaven,
While the soft glamour of old legend plays
Across the lawns where good red cattle graze,
Till he begins to dream of days of old
When the old sea dogs crossed yon sea for gold,
And wives and mothers watched with faces grey
The vessels vanishing across the bay.
O land of milk and honey, past compare,
Where rain or mist or cloud floats ever fair,
Where the infatuate "goffer" saves his soul
And his fair fame by landing in a hole!
Where from the pebble ridge, the venturous boy
Springs to deep water with a shout of joy.
Where here and there, at ebbing of the tides,
Her bicycle the manly maid bestrides,
And where the ghost of old Salvation Yeo
Haunts happy hunting grounds—'tis Westward Ho!

BOURNEMOUTH.

Once Bournemouth was a pretty country side,
Its gravelled beach washed by a gentle tide,
With sloping hills and hollows all around,
Where rural peace and quiet a refuge found;
And a small brook down through the valley strayed,
Then, winding to the sea, its tribute paid;
But now the spoiler with the axe and pick
Removes the pine to raise his house of brick;
And speculating harpies, far and near,
Like carrion crows, are congregated here
To buy the land, and then in plots re-let
For any use, if they a profit get,
While bars and drug shops make an open show,
And doctors, thick as waves, the streets o'erflow;
And muffled invalids—a horrid sight—
With cans at mouth and nose in broad daylight,
Inhaling heaven knows what, still crawl along,
And in the gardens constitute the throng;
Where begging bands unearthly discord make,
And scare all choristers from bush and brake.

BOURNEMOUTH.

Let Kentish Margate, 'Arry's favourite haunt,
Its chalky cliffs and healthful breezes vaunt.
Let Brighton, Empress of the Sussex coast,
Make the Pavilion of great George its boast.
To wond'ring eyes let fair Torquay display,
In Devon's favoured shire, its glittering bay.
Let Yorkshire's sturdy sons their voices raise
With one accord in queenly Scarborough's praise.
Let Norfolk point to Cromer and declare
No sea-side place has such salubrious air.
On bright Llandudno, from the sheltered side,
Of Penmaenmawr, let Taffy gaze with pride;
Yet I to none of these, whene'er I yearn
For Neptune's freshening breath, my footsteps turn,
But seek another place in which I find
The various merits of them all combined.
That place is Bournemouth, you who read these lines
Go scent, if yet you've not, its fragrant pines.
Stroll through its gardens, and you'll own with me,
It heads the list of places by the sea.

BALLINTOY.

Ye, who would from the madding crowd seek peace,
Go, find it where the surges never cease,
Tossing and breaking with resistless force,
Changeful, mysterious, in their restless course,
And frowned on by those headlands looming high,
That echo ocean's plaint and sea-mew's cry;
Where there is no parade, no band, no pier,
No smart "At Homes," where tea and gossip cheer,
No golfing—here the ardent golfer thinks,
What is a wat'ring-place without its links?—
A haven where our mother Nature reigns,
And charms her children who have hearts and brains
To love such scenes as here may meet their eyes.
Afar, distinct tho' distant, Scotland lies,
While in the foreground rugged Rathlin's rocks
Show a bold front, which at the storm fiend mocks;
Near by Fairhead stands, solemn and serene,
While to the north Bengore's dark head is seen.
Here all who seek for health and purest joy
Come ye, and find them both at Ballintoy.

NORTH BERWICK.

Across the "island-studded Forth" her eyes
Look out, and see the distant mountains rise.
The Lomonds of the kingdom clear and plain,
Beyond them, softly blue the Ochil chain;
And far away, almost beyond our ken,
The misty peak of some great Highland Ben;
These in the distance—and then close at hand
The finest links that golfer could demand.
You'll meet great statesmen as you play your round,
Ministers and ex-Ministers abound:
And silent members here find language fit
When struggling to "Perfection" from the "Pit."
Now golfers have the rocks, the sea, the sand,
But no parade, thank goodness, and no band.
For those who from the present fain would pass
Two ancient castles, and the mighty Bass,
Have each their story of a bygone day,
What more? Grand air and good hotels, and they
Who climb the Law's steep cone, on looking down
Can say, "North Berwick's but nine hours from Town."

Delicious Folkestone, peaceful and serene,
Where canst thou, Albion, show a fairer scene?
Where everything unites to charm the eye,

SALTBURN-BY-THE-SEA.

I love thy deep rock pools in ocean's tide,
Where 'neath the dense sea-wrack their treasures hide;
Bright shells, and seaweed fair on glittering sand,

Old Huntcliffe's rocky steep I love to climb,
And view his image mirrored in the brine,
Or watch the sea with angry foam lash high
His flanks, and listen to the sea-birds' cry.
How often with delight I've roamed thy dells,

The bubbling burn that round thee lingering flows,

STRATHPEFFER.

Dear Sir, or Madam, or dear Demoiselle,
If you desire pleasure and health as well,
Then to the north of Scotland you should go,
Where fair Strathpeffer's healing waters flow.
A sweeter spot one scarce could wish to see,
Set in the midst of beauteous scenery;
There's moor and mountain, loch and waterfall,
With purest Highland air blowing o'er all.

At seven o'clock the piper's music shrill
Rouses all up, their duties to fulfil.
At half-past seven the band begins to play;
Then fairly starts the business of the day.
Each hurries to the pump-room for a glass
Of mineral water, served by Highland lass.
Then follow baths of sulphur, pine or mud,
To cure disease and purify the blood.
Of course there's golf and "byke"—ça va sans dire,
Good lodgings, and hotels with ample cheer.
Just try the Northern Spa, and you'll depart
Sounder in body, and more light of heart.

HERNE BAY.

To thee, Herne Bay, this tribute I present,
Thou fairest spot in that fair county—Kent.
Though other towns more visitors may boast,
Or show a grander sea, a wilder coast,
A larger theatre, a longer pier,
Hotels as big again, and twice as dear,
Within this breast they ne'er can find a part,
For, sweet Herne Bay, alone thou hold'st my heart.

Thou kind physician that ne'er yet denied
Thine aid to those who in thy care abide,
No nauseous draughts thy pharmacopœia holds,
No boluses, or pillules cast in moulds,
Thy only medicine—a tonic wine
Fresh from the sea, with redolence of brine,
A wholesome, balmy, ozone-laden breeze
That gives to weakness strength, to suffering ease.
This, this dost thou right royally dispense,
Pure air and sweet; then, as to the expense,
'Tis next to nothing; one needs not to be
A multi-millionaire to dwell with thee.

ST. PAIR, NORMANDY.

A tiny village on the silver sea,
Nestling 'mid orchards in fair Normandie.
On golden sands the happy children play
By the blue waters of St. Pair's fair bay,
Remote from fashion with its noise and glare.
We bask in sunshine and in breezes fair.
We watch the peasants, picturesque and neat,
Selling their wares in the one village street.
We see them pass along at early morn
O'er dewy meads and thro' the ripening corn,
To the old church that stands with open door,
And welcomes all within its precincts hoar.
We wade for shrimps, pick shells of ev'ry hue,
We bathe in water warm, and clear, and blue;
We climb to where the Crucifix looks down
On mighty ocean and on tiny town—
Symbol we see on ev'ry headland grand,
Reared by the fishers in this simple land.
Long may St. Pair remain from fashion free—
A gem uncut beside the silver sea.

WEYMOUTH.

Bright Weymouth has a quiet charm to lure,
The tourist back to breathe its air so pure.
The swelling downs girding its beauteous bay,
Whose waters are now sapphire, emerald, grey.
The sun seems lovingly to stay and hide
'Mid cove and cliff, when throbs the coming tide.
Ascend the Nothe, the harbour waters flow
Where grim and rocky Portland looms below.
The breakwater—more west the Chesil beach,
A fine coup-d'œil, far as the eye can reach.
Seaside amusements of all kinds are found,
And the band's daily concerts are renowned.*
Sometimes the harbour is alive with ships,
The Channel Fleet anchors from foreign trips.
This year some Russian ships and German came,
And now the Foudroyant sounds Nelson's fame.
Besides the trips by char-a-banc and boat,
Regattas bring swift yachts that gaily float.
Fair curves the bay, in coloured lamps soft gleam,
Making nights lovely as a faëry dream.

Esperanza.

* Sir J. Stainer, staying at the Burdon, signified his high appreciation of the performances.

BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

Across the "silver streak" we sail to where,
Above the waters, stands Boulogne-sur-mer:
A town which rose to fame in Cæsar's day,
And Roman legions thundered on their way;
But yet their memory is not all forgot,
Their glory hovers still around the spot.
E'en now its soil betokens classic ground,
As curious relics of the past are found.
The ramparts, too, with age and tempest grey,
Seem even grander, lovlier in decay,
As if they still might Time's stern power defy,
And give to mortals immortality.

How chang'd the scene! the sands are all alive
With varied specimens of Nature's hive;
The bright Casino lures by night and day
Vot'ries to music—victims to the "play;"
The voitures rattle o'er the stony streets;
Brightness and laughter all around one meets;
While yet, as though to warm the wav'ring soul,
The dome of Notre Dame still crowns the whole.

CONWAY.

Sweet Conway! with thy treasures old and new,
What charming picture opens to my view,
As, standing on an elevated ground,
I saw the stretch of scenery around!
Beneath me, in the foreground, lies the town,
O'er which the turrets of a castle frown;
Lo! what a mass of house-tops from my perch
I see, all clustering around the church.
A lovely cooling valley lies to right,
Its woods and streamlets seeming to invite
The weary traveller to a quiet rest,
Among the verdure on its peaceful breast;
And, lifted heavenward in the distance grand,
The frontier mountains of Snodonnia stand.
To left, a lucid, shining river gleams,
With little skiffs a-sailing down the streams.
And from the rocks, above the glistening sands,
A great iron bridge, o'er sea far-stretching, stands.
Beyond, the waste of shimmering ocean lies,
Beyond, again, the golden sunset skies.

Rugeley.

MARGATE.

O good old Margate! loved as when a boy
I stepped light-hearted from thy classic hoy,
Hailing the welcome sand and cliffs with glee,
Books shelved, school shunted, and the rover free!
If since those days thou'st suffered a sea change,
'Twas but to give thy charms a wider range;
Still is in Thanet Island of the blest,
For youth full freedom, for age perfect rest.
Here toilers of the desk, slaves of the mart,
Lay down their burthen with a thankful heart;
Nor welcomed less the stranger in thy gates,
Who comes in garb unknown to fashion plates.
Whom slumber soothes not, pleasure cannot please,
For thee is healing in the Channel breeze;
Wouldst "join the mazy dance" Halls by the Sea
And Cecil-square have open doors for thee.
Do flowers delight thee? Blooms for all who will
The summer garden of the Cliftonville;
And best and purest boon beyond compare
Is Nature's anodyne—the Margate air!

TENBY.

Tenby! Tenby! Ten times your praise I sing,
By ten twice told now boldly will I cling;
Ozone and sunshine so intoxicate;
Right 'gainst your foes I hurl my scorn and hate.
Brit! Brit! Brit-annia! rules the mighty main!
High mount, your fort, St. Cath'rine's! I there strain
My sense of vision till the ocean vast O'erwhelms me; and then playfully I cast
My query net, and ask, "Who owns these shores
These portals of the beautiful, and doors
Of gladness?" But with boat to Manobier
Let's go. Fine castle this! Grand ruin here!
Impressions lasting. Turn me round and reach
Penally; and lo! what a stretch of beach
Old Tenby does possess. The day to clinch
We pass along to gully, Water-Winch.
Hast heard of caves right clear away from land?
Thither we speed, the boat with practised hand
Goes in, and awe and admiration rise
As revel we 'midst Tenby's sights and skies.

RAMSGATE.

Hard by the Goodwin Sands our Ramsgate lies,
Fair cynosure of most East-enders' eyes;
Hither they flock, yet how they live or sleep,
Would puzzle mortals, and make angels weep.
From morn to dewy eve the sands they haunt,
The married guzzle, and the single flaunt;
Babies in arms, in chaises, all in tears,
Are here in thousands to confound the ears;
The children swarm, while parasitic things
Crawl, bite, and hop in worse than Highland flings.
To Pegwell, Broadstairs, Margate, vans are full,
As up the hill the wretched horses pull;
The boys are crammed, one shilling each the trip,
Dear, too, at that, when hearts are near the lip;
Starved donkeys gallop to the murd'rous thwack;
Poor goats must strain and tug till sinews crack;
Preachers, pianos, niggers, pockets ease—
Seaside would be no seaside without these!
While pseudo-yachtsmen swagger on the pier,
Thanking their stars the foreman isn't here.

TORQUAY.

Nymph of the golden west, with sparkling crest,
Perched on a pearly throne, so fair and lone;
'Tis thine rich gifts to pass unto the mass,
Who seek for health and tone within thy zone.
Like to the morning star thou shin'st afar,
To grace with beauty's smile our sea-girt isle;
Whilst fairy zephyrs are to thy bright car
Bound prisoners, the while hearts to beguile.
See how yon boundless sea loves liberty,
Its feathered wavelets meet around thy feet,
With wealth of jewelry enseaming thee,
While Neptune both doth greet with kisses sweet.
Beloved of all art thou! and liv'st, I ween,
Of all our Spas just now the peerless queen.

Balaclava.

BRIGHTON.

When dancing sunbeams on the water play
And tip with gold the waves to herald day,
With dewy freshness shines the pebbly beach
As far as Worthing or the eye may reach.
At midday, when the sun has topp'd the main,
Behold the mimes that struggle here for gain!
The sweating crowds that (thank the Lord!) don't stay,
And think they've come to spend a happy day,
Whose dress accentuates their faces mean;
For rank vulgarity now reigns supreme.

But autumn comes, and what a change is here;
'Tis then that Fashion's brightest stars appear.
When fog once more envelopes all the town
The "Queen" deserves her justly-earned renown,
And, rightly favoured by the sun, displays
Her beauty heightened by the cheerful rays.
Here anxious lords, by Party cares oppress,
And witty democrats enjoy their rest.
All bless the day that first their eyes set sight on The Empress-Queen of Watering-Places, Brighton!

ENTRE NOUS.

THE Queen is to return to Windsor Castle from Balmoral on November 13 or 14, and on December 18 or 22 her Majesty will proceed to Osborne for two months.

A great deal of nonsense has appeared in the papers about Lord Salisbury's visit to Balmoral. He did not go as Minister in attendance, nor was he summoned in order "to discuss affairs with the Emperor of Russia." Whenever a Foreign Sovereign pays a visit to the Queen it is the invariable practice to invite the Prime Minister to Court to meet the guests as a matter of course.

The Prince of Wales, who comes to town to-morrow from Norwich, will be at Newmarket all next week, and also from the 26th until the 30th, when he goes to Sandringham. The week intervening between the Newmarket meeting will be spent at Wynyard Park, County Durham, when H.R.H. is to be the guest of Lord and Lady Londonderry, and the Princess and Princess Victoria are to meet him there on the 19th, coming from Balmoral.

During the first week in January the Prince and Princess are to pay a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland at Trentham Hall, Staffordshire. The Prince is to have a day's shooting in the Trentham coverts, and there will be a lawn meet of the North Staffordshire Foxhounds, the pack of which the Duke of Sutherland is Master. The Princess is to open a bazaar at Fenton, in aid of a local charity.

An imaginative "London Correspondent" states that the Prince of Wales won over £30,000 in bets and stakes last Thursday, and that the race was witnessed by one of the largest crowds ever seen at Newmarket. As a matter of fact, there was a remarkably meagre attendance, and the Prince's gains are represented by the value of the stake, i.e., £8,990. H.R.H. had no bets on the race, and in order to have won the ridiculous sum mentioned it would have been necessary for him to risk more than £35,000, even supposing that any such sum could have been invested on Persimmon for the owner.

I see that a turf writer in the Standard predicts an unusually good entry for the Ascot Cup next year, on the ground that Persimmon is engaged for this event, and that "it may be expected that owners of good horses will esteem it an honour to contest this famous trophy with the Prince." If any considerable number of racing men are really so infatuated as to enter their horses for a race merely for the honour of running their animals simultaneously with one owned by the Prince of Wales, snobbishness is a more potent and widespread vice than I have hitherto imagined. But I quite admit that the opinion of the Standard on this point may be worth more than mine.

The Duke of Coburg, who has been staying for a fortnight at Bucharest with the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Roumania, is to be at Darmstadt with the Duchess (who is at Rosenau, near Coburg) to meet the Emperor and Empress of Russia, after which he is going to Hinter-Riss, his beautiful domain in the Tyrol, for chamois shooting. The Duke is to arrive at Clarence House from Germany about November 16, and he will stay in England for a month. He is to visit the Queen at Windsor Castle and the Prince and Princess of Wales at Sandringham, where he is to be a guest from November 28 until December 7.

I learn that the Duke of Connaught is to represent the Queen at the marriage of the Duc d'Orléans and the Archduchess Maria Dorothea, which is to take place at Vienna during the first week in November. The Duke and Duchess of Coburg are expected to be present at the wedding.

The Duke and Duchess of York are now settled for the winter at York Cottage, Sandringham, where they will receive a visit next month from the Duke and Duchess of Teck and Prince and Princess Adolphus. The Duke and Duchess of York will not be much at St. James's Palace next season, as they are to make Bushey Park their principal residence from Whitsuntide until the end of July. It will take a large sum to put Bushey into proper repair, and the Office of Works are to complete their operations by the middle of May. As I have before said, it really does seem to me that the public ought not to be required to pay for the work at Bushey. The Duc de Nemours occupied this place by the Queen's "grace and favour" for forty-seven years, and his estate certainly should be liable for all the dilapidations.

No outlay troubles an Emperor of Russia, as he is not limited in his expenditure by a settled Civil List. Every rouble in the Imperial Treasury is supposed to be the Emperor's own property, and he draws on it ad lib., besides his vast revenue from the estates, forests, and mines which pass with the Crown. During the Emperor's present tour his halts at Vienna, Breslau, and Paris are "Sovereign visits," and the Imperial gifts on leaving must be regulated by precedent. His visits to Bernstorff, Balmoral, Darmstadt, Coburg, and Schwerin are private, and therefore he can do as he pleases in the bestowal of presents and decorations. The gold and diamond snuff-boxes, which etiquette requires the Emperor to present to the chief officials of each Court he visits, are supposed to be worth £500 each.

If the Emperor of Russia failed to distinguish himself as a sportsman during his stay on Deeside, the Munshi Abdul Karim had a good day last Tuesday, when he went up the hill of Craig Gowan for a few hours, and returned in triumph with a roe deer, a hind, an immense fox, and two owls. It is not the usual practice to shoot hinds so early in the season, but the Munshi does not appreciate any such nice distinctions.

The Duke and Duchess of Teck are, the week after next, to be the guests of Mr. Arthur and Lady Clementina Walsh, at Warfield Park, Berkshire. On Wednesday, the 21st, the Duchess is to open an Art Exhibition at Bracknell.

I am sorry that a statement should have found its way into TRUTH a fortnight ago to the effect that the Duke of Cambridge was to pay a visit this month to the Duke of Grafton at Euston Hall. The announcement was manifestly erroneous, Euston Hall and the shooting being at the present time let to Mr. T. H. Pearson Gregory.

Lord Bagot's appointment as Lord-in-Waiting to the Queen, which has excited the fury of a number of Tory Peers, was made by her Majesty without consulting Lord Salisbury, in order to please Princess Louise. Lord Bagot was aide-de-camp to Lord Lorne in Canada, and some years ago Princess Louise induced the Queen to make him a Gentleman Usher, but he had to give up that post when he became a Peer.

Apropos of the Havre Consulship, I hear that President Faure expressed his desire to make Mr. Bernal, the late Consul, an officer of the Legion of Honour, and that the Foreign Office refused to allow the honour to be accepted. Why? On the face of it the refusal is gratuitously discourteous to M. Faure and the nation he represents, and churlish towards our own representative. Was it the work of Lord Salisbury, or of an officious underling?

Ireland is placed in a very peculiar position, at a time when Great Britain is full of effusive loyalty because the Queen has beaten the reigning record of all other British Sovereigns. Only twelve days of the longest reign in English history have been spent in Ireland by the Sovereign. Nearly thirty-five years have passed since her last visit to the country. The greater she is, and the more entirely worthy of the respect, affection, and praises of those over whom she reigns, the more poignant is the grievance that her Irish subjects have never been afforded the opportunity of knowing her. As if this were not enough, the Irish are generally accused of disloyalty, because they do not break forth into loyal effusiveness, which could be nothing but hypocritical on their part, under the circumstances. Surely the heart most hardened to Irish grievances must admit that there is here a legitimate grievance.

It is suggested that the grievance might be removed, and the record of the long reign made glorious for Ireland, as for the sister Kingdom, by the establishment of a Royal residence in the country. The time is favourable for this idea, and it would prove economical in the end, by lessening the acuteness of the Irish question, which in its acute phases becomes very expensive.

A third philosopher has favoured me with his theory touching the origin of the practice of walking backwards before Royalty. "I doubt not," he says, "that your correspondent is substantially correct in his conjecture that the practice originated among savage tribes; but I question whether it was prompted by a sense of decency. The truth I believe to be that the primitive Monarch, being sometimes of a hasty temper and often of a playful humour, was apt to take an undue advantage of his visitors when their backs were turned, and by keeping their faces towards him his subjects were in a better position to evade a parting compliment from the sovereign's toe or any missile which he might have handy." This theory is also plausible, but I must leave it to the learned to decide which side has the better claim to credit.

Mr. Froude's house at Salcombe, South Devon, is to be sold, and it is stated that Carlyle was often a guest there. As a matter of fact, Carlyle was never either at or anywhere near Salcombe in his life.

Bath House, Piccadilly, has again changed hands, for the third time during the last eight years. After the death of the late Lord Ashburton, Bath House (which is freehold) was sold to Mr. Henry Brassey, and when he died it was purchased by Baron Hirsch, whose executors have just disposed of the property to Mr. Wernher.

There was quite an exodus of Devonshire farmers last week, several well-known agriculturists having given up their holdings in the western county in order to take farms in Essex, Cambridgeshire, and Sussex. Two large farms on Lord Petre's estate, near Ingatestone, have been let to farmers who have for many years rented holdings in the neighbourhood of Exeter.

So far I have had no satisfactory response to the request I published a month ago for authentic information concerning the changes that are said to have been effected at Walmer Castle since Lord Salisbury became Lord Warden. It is true a local journal has expressed itself confident that "Lord Salisbury is not the man who would ruthlessly deprive the public of any privileges it has hitherto enjoyed, or prevent the patriotic from inspecting relics which are sacred to the nation;" but it is careful not to attempt a direct answer to such a specific question, for instance, as that relating to the Wellington room. Is this room still in the state in which it was some years ago decided to permanently preserve it; or has it been, contrary to the arrangement then made, wholly or partially dismantled, and utilised as an ordinary bedroom? I have heard various contradictory reports on the subject, and one of my correspondents is very confident that Lord Salisbury cannot have allowed the Wellington relics to be disturbed. But nobody seems to be in a position to speak with absolute certainty, for the simple reason that for some time past nobody outside the household has had an opportunity of seeing the room.

While this particular question as to the Iron Duke's room remains unsettled, my recent inquiry has brought me an interesting statement on another matter which has occasioned a good deal of talk in the neighbourhood. It is to the effect that soon after the appointment of the present Lord Warden five gardeners at the Castle were discharged, all of them being men who had been regularly employed by his Lordship's predecessors for many years past. One of the number was the head-gardener, a man who had worked at Walmer Castle—first under Lord Granville, and afterwards under the late Mr. W. H. Smith and Lord Dufferin—for a period of no less than thirty years. Another had been there for twenty-eight years, a third for twenty-five years, fourth (since re-engaged) for twenty years, and the fifth for nine years. With one exception, these men are not infirm or past their work, and there is naturally much speculation as to the reasons for such a wholesale dismissal of old servants. Walmer Castle is not, of course, on quite the same footing as a private residence, and it seems scarcely credible that Lord Salisbury can object to any burden which previous Lord Wardens have been willing to accept with that distinguished office. For my own part, indeed, I feel sure that he is not personally responsible for what has been done in his name. Then who is? Perhaps the correspondent who has so keenly interested himself in the defence of the Lord Warden in regard to the other matter will now turn his attention to this new question.

A fair correspondent asks to be allowed to plead the cause of the birds in the columns of TRUTH. She assures me that fashion has decreed that white plumes or ospreys are again to be generally worn through the coming winter, and she sends some verses of appeal to her fashionable sisters, which I have much pleasure in printing:—

A PLEA FOR THE BIRDS.

Does it never strike you, ladies,
As your plume-trimmed hats you buy,
That for each one of those feathers
Some maimed bird has had to die?
That for every spray-tipped bonnet
That so heedlessly you wear,
In an act of cruel slaughter
In effect you've had a share?

You may plead you didn't know it,
That, by Fashion's laws coerced,
You've unwittingly offended,
Have but thoughtless been at worst.
But, oh, surely now we tell you
What this feather craze implies,
It no longer will find favour
As it now does in your eyes.

When you know that birds are butchered,
By the thousand every spring,
Ere as yet their callow young ones
From the nest have taken wing;
When you know those helpless young ones,
Of their mother's care bereft,
To die slowly of starvation,
Are most mercilessly left;

When you know such cruel torture
Must too certainly be borne,
Ere the tufts prescribed by Fashion
Can on your new hats be worn;
Surely then, you, too, will join us,
Such a practice to deplore,
And will vow, for very pity,
You will feathers wear no more.

It is no great thing we ask you,
For still charming you would be
Though no heron's plume or osprey's
On your bonnets we could see;
But, indeed, if you continue
Still such plumage to esteem,
What has hitherto been thoughtless
Will intensely heartless seem.

Then your ears, we beg you, ladies,
To this prayer of ours incline,
And forthwith against a fashion
That is barbarous, combine.
Yes, speak out, as you are women,
And the welcome news impart—
Birds no longer shall be butchered
That your bonnets may be smart!

Mr. Allen, the proprietor of Astor House Hotel, New York, has been interviewed on the subject of the recent paragraph in TRUTH about the loss of an English traveller's luggage at that establishment. It may be remembered that the traveller in question alleged that Mr. Allen had promised to pay him 60 dols. for the loss he had sustained, and that, not being able to obtain the money, he recounted the circumstances to me, offering to present the money to the TRUTH Toy Fund if I could induce Mr. Allen to pay up. Mr. Allen's version of the affair is thus given in the New York Press :—

WATER SUPPLY FOR MANSIONS, &c.—Artesian Bored and Driven Tube Wells, Wind Engines for pumping, &c.—State your requirements to ALFRED WILLIAMS & Co., 39, Gt. Eastern-st., London, E.C.

About a year ago an Englishman was here for one night, paying 1.50 dols. for his room. When he went away he left a small satchel in the store-room. Several months afterwards he returned and got it. When he opened it he raised a howl that goods worth 60 dols. had been stolen from it.

Unless the contents were diamonds or gold bricks, the satchel was too small to hold anything worth that much. There was no evidence that the satchel had been tampered with, and all there was to prove the loss was the Englishman's word, and I did not believe him. At any rate, if I had wanted to, I could have charged him storage that would have equalled the amount he claimed. I haven't paid a cent, and I do not intend to, no matter how many free copies of London Truth I receive.

Mr. Allen is apparently afflicted with a defective memory. I have communicated with the owner of the luggage respecting the above statement, and he replies that there is not a word of truth in it, with the exception of the statement that he stayed at the hotel one night, and paid 1.50 dols. for his room. His visit took place not a year ago, but on January 12 last. He left in the store-room, not a "small satchel," but (1) a troopship trunk measuring 2 ft. 6 in. long by 2 ft. by 1 ft.; (2) a large-sized Gladstone bag measuring 24 in. by 15 in.; (3) a suit case, the measure of which he is unable to give at the moment, but which was of substantial size. He did not return "several months afterwards," but at the end of twenty-two days, i.e., on February 4. He discovered then, as stated in my original reference to the matter on July 9, that both the Gladstone bag and the suit case had been cut open, and everything of value abstracted. The proprietor did not attempt to suggest, as he does now, that there was no foundation for the complaint, but asked his customer to estimate the amount of his loss, and although the gentleman was not able to see him again before he sailed for England on the following morning, he received from the hotel clerk an assurance that the amount claimed, 60 dols., should be paid. This gentleman is not now asking for the money for himself, but is merely insisting on his claim as a matter of principle, and there cannot be the slightest ground for questioning his veracity. I give Mr. Allen the benefit of the doubt as to his memory having played him false; but now that he has been plainly reminded of the full details of the occurrence, and his own inaccuracy on specific portions of his statements clearly proved, I trust he will put the matter right by paying over the money to the Truth Toy Fund, as he has been authorised to do. If he does not, I fear that English travellers may form not unreasonable prejudices against his hotel in future.

Leech pictured the Alderman at the Guildhall banquet addressing his lady friends with: "Now, gals, I've quite done. Can I get you anything?" But it would seem that even this exhibition of gallantry was out-done at the late banquet in the Philharmonic Hall, Liverpool, in connection with the meeting of the British Association. Some two hundred hospital nurses were paraded on this occasion to grace the feast; and I have it on the authority of one of them that, after having been in attendance for about four hours, they were dismissed without being offered so much as a sandwich!

Two serious complaints have been addressed to me by passengers who have just completed a co-operative educational yachting tour in the Midnight Sun, under the auspices of Messrs. Lunn & Perowne. Although I have had occasion to criticise Messrs. Lunn & Perowne's agency in connection with the Grindelwald Conference, I do not wish to take any hostile attitude towards them in the legitimate branches of their business; but it really seems to me that the allegations of these passengers call for notice. By their contract they were entitled to complete their voyage to Tilbury, but on arrival at Newcastle the work of coaling and of caulking the decks was taken in hand, with the result, as every one who knows anything about ships can judge for himself, that life was rendered intolerable for those passengers who remained on board. At Tilbury, notwithstanding that all the luggage had been passed by the Customs at Newcastle, a second examination took place, which detained the passengers for about three hours; in addition to which harbour dues of some kind were charged on landing, one passenger stating that she had to pay 7s. 6d. under this head, in addition to 4s. for porterage. Other complaints are also made about the price of liquors, the intolerable smells on board, and the scarcity of fresh water. To put it in the mildest way, it seems to be a case where explanation and apology, if not more substantial reparation, are due from the managers of the cruise.

Here is a new development of the cycle craze, which will come as a surprise to many. Broadcast over the country the worship of the wheel has left a golden shower behind it to benefit the populations of manufacturing towns; but now, according to statements which have not been contradicted, it has brought in grist to the mill of many an aristocratic dame and society beauty. In fact, it is confidentally asserted that astute manufacturers have employed high-born ladies to sell their machines on "the usual commission." I don't know that there is any crime in turning bag-man—I mean bag-woman—as a means of supplementing one's income, but, all the same, it jars a little upon one's susceptibilities to think that the gushing praises of a particular "bike" may have their origin in profit—perhaps at the expense of a little fibbing.

For the benefit of cyclists who are off to the Riviera for the winter, I have been asked to bring to their notice the advantages that may be gained by joining the "Touring Club de France," the headquarters of which are at 5, Rue Coq-Héron, Paris. This club confers on its members most of the advantages accorded to the members of the English Cyclists' Touring Club, with the addition of the right of free entry of machines into both France and Italy upon the simple presentation of the owner's card of identification at the Custom House — a privilege that will be regarded by many as alone worth the five francs subscription. English cyclists desirous of joining should address themselves to one of the délégués of the club in this country, among whom are Mr. E. Freshfield, jun., 5, Bank-buildings, E.C., and Mr. C. F. Just, 17, Victoria-street, S.W.

Talking of bicycles, an alarming interpretation of the prevailing fashion was put forward the other day by the Rev. W. Robinson, of Christ Church, Plymouth. This reverend gentleman, like a good many before him, has come to the conclusion that the end of the world is at hand, and he bases this belief on a declaration of the prophet Daniel, that in the last time "many shall run to and fro on the earth." The prophet, it seems, when he wrote these words, had "bikes" in his eye, though why he should have spoken of men running to and fro on the earth when he really meant that they would go about on wheels, the interpreter of the prophecy does not explain. Those who are in no hurry for the Day of Judgment may console themselves with the reflection that, as the world has survived the invention of railways, which has certainly caused more running to and fro on the earth than anything else, it may also possibly survive the invention of "bikes." On the other hand, if the end of all things is drawing near, it will be a consolation to cyclists to know that wheeling is to be one of the features of the Millennium.

It is a strange thing to find people who have long resided in a particular West Indian island differing diametrically as to the sanitary condition of the place. The other day I gave, on the authority of a medical gentleman thoroughly familiar with the place, some unfavourable views on the healthiness of St. Kitts and Antigua. I was at once begged, from various quarters, to point out that St. Kitt's and Antigua do not, in this respect, represent the West Indies generally; and now I have a gentleman who has passed thirty-five years of his life in St. Kitts—thirty-three of them within a mile of Basseterre—assuring me that "this beautiful little town is one of the best kept and most clean throughout the West Indies." He enlarges on his reasons for this opinion, and states his belief that the four recent cases of yellow fever referred to by my first informant all arose out of one, which was imported, and not home-bred. It is perfectly impossible to arrive at any conclusion in the face of this conflict of evidence, and I can only pronounce, in the Scotch phrase, that the charge against St. Kitts is "not proven."

Lovers of animals are perpetually writing about the troubles and sufferings of the homeless cat in London, especially during the summer and autumn, when many unfortunate animals are left to live as they can while their owners are temporarily absent from town. A lady correspondent now complains that in St. John's Wood and the neighbourhood the usual army of these wandering and starving creatures has been largely augmented through the conduct of many of the inhabitants whose houses are being demolished for the new railway line, and whose cats have been abandoned to roam about the district, mangy and pitiable objects. If people cannot take the harmless necessary pussy away when they move, they might at least have the mercy to destroy her.

The following letter from "An Old Golfer" respecting the autumn meeting of the Royal and Ancient Golf Club will doubtless prove of interest to my golfing readers:—

The autumn meeting of the Royal and Ancient Golf Club last week was favoured by the first decent weather we have had in Scotland for months; from Monday onwards it was fine. The place was as full as ever, and though the gathering was not as cosmopolitan or representative as on some previous occasions—notably two years ago, when Mr. A. J. Balfour became captain of the club—yet many well-known people and not a few famous golfers came to grace the occasion. The businss meeting of the club on Tuesday was unusually important and well attended, and it is hoped that the result of it will be the formation of a joint committee of eight great clubs, to legislate on matters pertaining to the game. The lottery, held the same evening in the club, was a conspicuous success, Mr. Kermack proving himself an ideal auctioneer; while the comparative uniformity of the prices obtained, even by so persuasive a salesman, was the highest possible compliment to the handicapping of the committee. Wednesday—the medal day—was fine and bright, but the strong south-west wind interfered a good deal with the play, especially the putting. Sixty-nine couples played the medal round, and Mr. Leslie Balfour-Melville's score of 82—a very creditable one considering the weather—was unbeaten, Mr. Laidlay being nearest him with 83. The win was a most popular one.

The new picture called "Medal Day at St. Andrews," which will probably be bought by the Club, was on view all day in the reading-room, and was the subject of much comment. It shows forty or fifty figures—all portraits, most of them excellent, of more or less well-known members—ranged in various groups and characteristic attitudes in front of the club-house, while in the foreground Tom Morris is "tee-ing" a ball for Mr. A. J. Balfour. But, in spite of the almost startling clearness of the picture as a whole, and the striking accuracy of most of the portraits, it was criticised severely—perhaps too much so. One prominent figure in it undoubtedly represents a golfing celebrity who is not a member of the Club; the size of the club-house, shown as a background, is much exaggerated; and the fact that no female figures appear in the groups counteracts the impression of realism which the picture otherwise imparts—for never at any time on Medal Day is the terrace in front of the Club deserted by ladies. Still, the picture is a fine one, and deserves to hang—as no doubt it will—in the big club-room for which it was probably intended.

The dinner on Wednesday evening was a great success; it was held in the club house instead of elsewhere (as was the case last year) and it was exceptionally pleasant and amusing. Captain Baird Hay of Belton, the new Captain, spoke feelingly and well, and Mr. Oswald (the retiring Captain) who undoubtedly did good service during his year of office, succeeded admirably in effacing any unpleasant impression which may have remained of the dinner the year before. No autumn meeting at St. Andrews is complete without at least one exhibition game of billiards from Captain Wolfe Murray, and on Wednesday night he was at his best.

The advertisement of Mr. Andrew Lang's forthcoming biography of John Gibson Lockhart states that the work will contain correspondence with certain friends, but the names of Mr. Croker and Mr. Murray do not appear in this list. Lockhart and Croker wrote to each other regularly for more than a quarter of a century, and some idea of the interest and importance of their correspondence may be gathered from a few letters published in "The Croker Papers," A biography of Lockhart without his pungent correspondence with Croker and with the successive proprietors of the Quarterly Review, would certainly be a publication analogous to the play of "Hamlet" with the part of the Prince omitted.

WILLIAM MORRIS:
DIED OCTOBER 3, 1896.

A many-sided artist he, a paradox, in sooth;
Rough and yet gentle, stern, yet kind, cultured and yet uncouth;
A sturdy Individualist in every act and deed,
And yet a staunch proclaimer of the Socialistic creed.

The misty days when might was right, and law a warrior's whim,
The lurid age of fire and sword, seemed glorious days to him;
And yet he strove to bring the world 'neath Socialism's sway,
And steep our many-coloured life in dull, depressing grey.

What as an artist he conceived, as politician he Resolved, with enigmatic will, full soon should cease to be;
And did his best to overwhelm and lay in ruins drear
That radiant Palace of the Arts he'd worked so hard to rear.

A dreamer of Utopian dreams, out of his due time born,
There was but little that he touched that he did not adorn;
And we, remembering all he wrought life's beauty to enhance,
May surely at the faults he had with fitting lenience glance.

Rarely have such conflicting views been mingled in one mind,
But rarely were more varied gifts in one strong brain combined;
So let us praise him, now he's gone—as one sincerely can—
As Poet, Craftsman, Artist, and most thorough Englishman!

I hear that Mr. Brown, who has been instrumental in bringing to light so many papers from the Venetian archives which have given us an insight into matters connected with our own history, has recently come across a series of familiar letters written by a Venetian residing in London during the reign of Queen Elizabeth to his family, in which the every-day life of the Court is portrayed. I trust that they will soon be published.

Our sons and daughters have just been returning to school after the holidays, which explains, I suppose, the following plaintive epistle found in my letter-box last week:—

> Why is it necessary that children at public schools should require to take large hampers of food, jams, and cakes back with them after the holidays, and have such things sent to them during the term? Also, why should boys require to buy supplementary food for breakfast, &c., as seems almost invariably the case? This is a crying grievance, and ought to be inquired into, as the expense of board, &c., is quite high enough to justify parents in expecting their children to be well fed, which almost all boys in various schools agree is not the case.

It may be a crying grievance, but to my certain knowledge it has been crying ever since I went to school myself. It probably began when the first boy went to school, and I expect it will continue until the last one comes home. My answer to my correspondent's query would be simply that large hampers of more or less unwholesome food are not necessary to boys, either when they return to school after the holidays, or at any other time, and that it is entirely the fault of parents that a custom has grown up of supplying them from home with these delicacies. I am certainly not going to contend that jam and cakes, not to mention "relishes" at the breakfast table, are necessary articles of diet which ought to be included in the bill of fare of every school; and if fond mothers want their boys to enjoy such luxuries, it is far better that they should supply them at their own discretion. As to all boys "agreeing" that they are insufficiently fed at school, the mere fact that they do all agree on this point, while scarcely any of them ever show any visible signs of being under-fed, seems to me to prove that those parents who pay any attention to their lamentations are very foolish.

Of course, the remark in last week's TRUTH, that "clergymen who have entered the Church through theological colleges are wretched scholars as a rule," was meant to apply to those clerics who have not graduated elsewhere before entering such colleges. I trust that no one would read the remark in any other sense, but I have had a letter from Oxford suggesting that the words as they stand may convey a false impression to people who do not understand all the circumstances, and I therefore hasten to add this explanation. As I suppose nearly every one knows, a very large number of University graduates, many of them men who have gained the highest honours, go through a course at a theological college before ordination, and some of the theological colleges only admit University graduates.

Although the Trustees of the Campbell College, Belfast, still maintain a dogged silence in regard to the grave charges which have been made against the management of the College, the Principal (Mr. James A. M'Neill) has deemed it expedient to say something on the subject. I am sorry that I cannot congratulate Mr. M'Neill upon either the manner or the matter of his statement. He has issued it in the form of a circular addressed to the parents of boys at the school just before the commencement of the present term. The circular begins with the remark that "it recently became necessary to make some changes in the teaching staff." This is, to say the least, a somewhat disingenuous allusion to the fact that the three senior house-masters and four assistant masters had resigned rather than be parties any longer to the Principal's methods of carrying on the work of the school. Mr. M'Neill next refers to the "high moral character" of the new teachers in words containing an innuendo against the late masters, which he may possibly be called upon to retract or substantiate in a court of law. Proceeding to deal with a statement which the four assistant masters circulated respecting their resignation, Mr. M'Neill says:—

> I think it right to let you know that the four masters who have been named in the statement I have referred to only sent in their resignations after an assurance had been sought for from me that they would be retained on the staff after the holidays, and it was only when I could not see my way to do so, looking to the best interests of the school, that they resigned.

All the gentlemen concerned deny the accuracy of this version of the affair. They affirm, on the contrary, that they jointly resolved to resign for the reason I have indicated above, and that their resignations were in every respect spontaneous and unconditional.

Mr. M'Neill goes on to give an account of the resignation of the three senior House-Masters which is equally calculated to convey an erroneous impression of the circumstances. He adds :—

> I have endeavoured, under very painful and trying circumstances and much provocation, to part with the services of these masters in a way that would tend to do them least injury, but the persistency with which some persons, desirous only of injuring this College, have circulated misleading and unfounded statements, have (sic) convinced me that my duty to the College requires that I should make to the parents of our pupils the foregoing statement.

It is only in these vague terms that Mr. M'Neill notices the serious statements which the late senior masters published in a pamphlet when they severed their connection with the College last May. In justification of their own action, they described in detail the system on which the Principal conducts the school and the difficulties to which it has led, and the only conclusion which can be drawn from their statements is, that Mr. M'Neill, however well-meaning he may be, is entirely lacking in the experience, tact, and judgment which are required for the successful management of a large public school—in other words, that the rest of his qualifications for the office into which he was pitchforked by the trustees, are on a par with his grammar. The allegations in question are too definite, and in view of the position of the College too important to the public, to be curtly dismissed with a general contradiction by the party whose competence is impugned.

The extraordinary falling off in the number of pupils at the College affords in itself conclusive evidence of the loss of public confidence in the administration of the College, though, if necessary, other facts could be mentioned. Last Christmas there were 280 boys at the school. When the seven masters resigned, the number was reduced to 210; and it has now fallen to 154, of whom forty are scholars. It is said that one of the three trustees is fully alive to the gravity of the situation. Cannot this gentleman do something to arouse his colleagues to a sense of their responsibilities? If that is not possible, cannot the intervention of some superior authority be secured to put an end to a state of things which is being attended with such disastrous consequences to the most richly endowed public school in Ireland?

An event of immense significance in ecclesiastical history took place last week without being noticed by the London Press. Two important denominations in Scotland, the Congregational Union and the Evangelical Union, have taken a practical step towards the much-talked-of "Reunion of the Churches" by joining their forces. This step has been contemplated for many years, and even now has only been accomplished with some opposition from a section of irreconcilables in both Churches. But the amalgamation has been agreed to, although it will not formally take effect until January next. After this it should not be very difficult to arrange a union with all the Presbyterian churches in Scotland, except, perhaps, the Established Church, and even that could be accomplished by disestablishment. English clerics, who are continually talking about "reunion," and doing their best to make it impossible, should take note of this object-lesson.

The Archbishop of Canterbury is to preach in St. Paul's Cathedral on Wednesday, the 21st, at the annual festival service of the Guild of St. Luke. The Lord Mayor and Sheriffs will attend in State.

The parishioners of Kingswood (Wotton-under-Edge) are about to choose a new Rector in the place of the late Rev. J. F. Young, who held the living for more than thirty years. There are upwards of 200 candidates, although the value of the benefice is under £200 a year. This living has been in the gift of the parishioners since the reign of Charles II., and the deed which conveyed the patronage to them was drawn up by Sir Matthew Hale.

Last week the Archbishop of Canterbury and Mrs. Benson left Dublin for the North of Ireland, on a round of visits and sight-seeing. They stayed with Lord Belmore, where there was a party invited to meet them, and with Lord Macnaghten. The residence of the latter is in a wild situation, on a cliff overlooking the Atlantic, and not far from the Giant's Causeway and the flourishing tourist resort, Portrush. The Archbishop visited Londonderry and the places of historic interest connected with the siege for which it is celebrated.

The Canonry in Ripon Cathedral which became vacant several months ago by the death of Archdeacon Bardsley has not been filled up by the Bishop until the very last moment, for some reason or other. The stall has been given to Archdeacon Danks, who will presumably resign the rectory of Richmond, as his emoluments from his other preferments now amount to £700 a year. Archdeacon Danks went into residence at Ripon on Thursday, and he will be on duty there until January 1, so that his large parish will be left to the care of his curates for three months.

I am reminded by a local reader of TRUTH that the late Archdeacon Favell was appointed to the Archdeaconry of Sheffield prior to the appointment of the present Vicar to his living. It is therefore not true that the Archdeaconry was given by way of making amends to Mr. Favell for the conduct of the Simeon Trustees in passing him over. What is more probable is that in appointing Mr. Favell to the Archdeaconry the Archbishop gave a hint to the Trustees of the direction in which he thought their patronage might be most suitably bestowed, and in Sheffield the opinion is held that this step defeated its own object by putting up the backs of the Trustees, and leading them to select a candidate of their own.

The Primus of the Scottish Church has responded to the memorial, noticed in last week's TRUTH, on the appointment of the Rev. A. C. Laughlin as a member of the Foreign Missions Board; and the reply is a truly edifying performance. The Primus first took refuge in the contention that as Mr. Laughlin had been appointed to an important mission charge in Glasgow, the Board were quite justified in electing him a member; and recommended the Glasgow memorialists to leave the matter in the hands of their Bishop. It was pointed out in reply to this that Mr. Laughlin was elected to the Foreign Missions Board three months before his appointment to the Glasgow Mission; whereupon the Lord Primus acknowledged his error, but professed his inability to interfere. The Bishop of Glasgow has already satisfied Glasgow church people that it is hopeless to appeal to him in this matter. Episcopacy, in fact, seems to be made of much the same stuff both in Scotland and England.

The death of Dr. Cazenove, who had been for eighteen years the Sub-dean and Chancellor of Edinburgh Cathedral, is much regretted in Scotland. Dr. Cazenove, whose career at Oxford was highly distinguished, was successively Vice-Provost and Provost of the Cumbrae Theological College for twenty-two years. He was decidedly the most distinguished divine in the Scottish Episcopal Church after the death of Bishop Wordsworth. He was an admirable preacher, writer, and speaker, a fine scholar, and a man of remarkably wide culture. He was Select Preacher at both Oxford and Cambridge.

A Yorkshire reader has been at the pains to send me a programme of an entertainment provided for the Bedale Church Choir, in which he seems to think there is something unbecoming; but, unless he means to suggest that those who sing in church on Sundays ought not to enjoy a supper, concert, and theatricals during the week—which I should be sorry to say myself—I don't quite see what he finds fault with. The only point that strikes me in the programme is the following comical announcement:—

> PRICES:—Tea, Reserved Seats at Entertainment, and First Sitting at Supper 2s. 6d. Tea, Second Seats at Entertainment, and Second Sitting at Supper, 1s. 6d.

Does the "second sitting at supper" pay less for having to wait, or for taking its chance of finding anything to eat?

In reference to my recent paragraphs concerning the Rev. Evan Jenkins, the Derbyshire Times confirms the statement that this cleric was for a considerable period in charge of the Parish of Wingerworth. "It is only fair to the Bishop of Southwell to state," adds my contemporary, "that he refused to license the said clergyman to Wingerworth, and that he was retained at Wingerworth in opposition to the Bishop's desires and in strict variance with the opinions of the churchwardens of the parish. His employment there was a grave scandal." Why, then, was he allowed to remain? Either the Bishop or the churchwardens could have prevented him from officiating if they had insisted upon enforcing the powers they possess, and the fact that they were conscious of the gravity of the scandal only makes it the more astounding that the man's engagement in the parish should have been tolerated so long.

It is gratifying to learn that the Rev. Mr. Taylor, curate of St. John's, Stoneygate, Leicester, has been effectively rebuked from his own pulpit for the narrow-minded and uncharitable sermon in which he advocated the boycotting of the services in connection with the meeting of the Congregational Union, and warned his flock that to enter a Nonconformist place of worship was a sin in the eyes of God and the Established Church. The next preacher from the same pulpit was, it seems, the Rev. J. Went, and this gentleman showed in the most unmistakable way his disapproval of Mr. Taylor's bigoted utterances. Not only did he do this in his discourse, but he took the first opportunity of going to a service in a neighbouring Congregational chapel, and the two churchwardens of St. John's also attended. It is to be hoped that the Reverend Taylor will profit by Mr. Went's precepts and example.

The following announcement in the Belfast News Letter conveys a novel and praiseworthy idea. I would suggest that if, whenever sermons were preached, collections were made on behalf of the sufferers, we should hear far fewer complaints about the emptiness of churches:—

> The Rev. Dr. Lynd will (D.V.) preach on the crisis in Armenia on to-morrow evening. Service at seven o'clock. Collection on behalf of the sufferers at both services.

A benevolent reader of TRUTH, having received from John James Jones particulars of Beach Rocks Home, at Sandgate, and an application form for the admission of a patient, tells me that he has been good enough to fill up this form with an application for a bed for the Editor of TRUTH. This is very kind of him, and I have no doubt that John James Jones will appreciate the joke. If I should ever want a bed at a convalescent home, however—which, I am thankful to say, I do not at present—there are many reasons why I should not select John James Jones's establishment for the purpose. For one thing, I should not feel altogether happy about the treatment I might receive under John James's roof; and for another, John James is by all accounts doing so well at Sandgate that I should be sorry to be numbered among those out of whom he makes such a good thing. For the latter reason, I should certainly not send any patient to Beach Rocks myself, so long as this pretended charity remains an instrument for the glorification of John James Jones.

I have received the following amounts towards this year's Toy Fund:—

From a Stores price-list which has been brought under my notice, I learn that a General's superfine scarlet tunic costs £20. 4s., while the dress jacket of a second lieutenant in the Horse Artillery costs £23. 15s. 6d. If I ordered one of my clerks to appear before me in a garment costing about 20 per cent. more than my own Sunday clothes, I should at least think it incumbent upon me to apportion his salary accordingly. On the same principle I would suggest to the Commander-in-Chief that he should either cause the dress jackets of second lieutenants R.H.A. to be cheapened, or raise their pay to about 20 per cent. above that of a General. If the second lieutenants are consulted in the matter they will probably prefer the latter alternative.

The Depot of the Essex Regiment at Warley seems to furnish some good instances of the limpet-like manner in which some men manage to stick to their berths in these places. The sergeant-major, if I mistake not, has hardly done any service worth speaking of outside the Depot, and the story goes that his only foreign Service consists in his having sailed to India in the last troop-ship of one season, and returned by the first in the next. The Depot quartermaster-sergeant has also passed nearly the whole of his military career within the Depot, and has managed to gain—much to his credit, so far as it goes—a medal for long service and good conduct. There are one or two other men who seem to have put in an equal amount of Depot service. The great objection to this sort of thing seems to me to be that it must place the Depot completely out of touch with regimental manners, customs, and traditions. An establishment officered largely by fossils who have seen nothing of service beyond their own little circle, can be of very little value as a training-school for recruits. It is also highly probably that a sergeant-major who has seen practically nothing of regimental life will get on very badly with N.C.O.s joining the Depot from the Line battalions. Of this, I believe, proofs could be found at Warley.

A deplorable amount of crime has lately occurred in the 2nd Battalion Worcester Regiment, at Malta. Such offences as striking N.C.O.s, using insubordinate language, and destroying rifles, have been of almost daily occurrence, and at least one case has occurred of a man using obscene and insulting language to the C.O. in the orderly room. The General recently told the men through the C.O. that they were a disgrace to the Service, and apparently the battalion is in little short of a state of mutiny.

The cause of this state of things is not far to seek. On the arrival of the battalion in Malta in November, 1895, it was quartered in the Isola Gate Barracks, admittedly the worst in the island. It is the usual thing to move a regiment from these barracks as soon as an opportunity occurs, and it was expected that when the King's Royal Rifles vacated the barracks at Intarfa about two months ago, the Worcestershire Regiment would have been moved in. This expectation was disappointed, apparently in deference to the wishes of the C.O. and other officers, who objected to move because the Intarfa Barracks, although the best in Malta, are some miles distant from Valletta. It seems to be the story of the 2nd Wiltshire Regiment and the Portsdown Forts over again. The rank and file have signified their resentment by comporting themselves in the manner above described. This conduct is indefensible, but equally indefensible is that of the C.O. and officers in condemning the men to remain in their present quarters, and that of the General in deferring to their wishes. The battalion is now in such a demoralised state that the only chance of restoring discipline is to bring the men together in one barracks, under the immediate eye of their officers, instead of keeping them in a series of detached buildings. If some step of this kind is not taken, things are likely to go from bad to worse.

In reference to the assertion that on the conviction of an N.C.O. by court-martial, reduction is the mildest punishment which the court can impose, another military correspondent writes me that "though this opinion is very widely held, it is quite unfounded." In support of this contention he refers me to sections 19, 44, and 138 (3) and (4), of the Army Act, and it appears to me that he has the law on his side. Under these provisions court-martials seem to have the power to impose fines and stoppages of pay, and so far from reduction being the lightest sentence which could be awarded, either in the case to which I referred or any other, it appears that the court could order as little as the stoppage of a single day's deferred pay; in other words, a forfeiture of 2d. on the prisoner's discharge from the Service—about as near an approach to a nominal punishment as could well be devised.

The latest offence against military discipline and good order to which I have been introduced is that of yawning on parade. For this crime a man in the 1st Bedfordshire Regiment was lately called to account, and punished by being sent to join a squad of evil-doers, who were being punished for dirtiness by having to clean the equipment of men who were in hospital. When I have seen our friend Tommy Atkins being inspected on parade, and comporting himself as much like a wooden image as possible, while an officer looks into the condition of his buttons, the way he has brushed his hair, and other details of this description, I have often wondered what would happen if he were to sneeze at the critical moment. Now I know. It may be said that yawning is a matter more easily kept under control than sneezing. But I am not so sure about this. I am not always able to control it myself.

I understand that it is the practice in the Cork District for the canteen profits, which are divided every quarter, to be carried by the Commanding Officers to the regimental funds. This arrangement does not meet with approval in the regiments so treated, and it is easy to understand the feeling. The regimental funds are administered at the discretion of the Commanding Officers, and the men are as a rule quite in the dark as to how the money is expended, and how far they benefit by the expenditure. The proper way to deal with all canteen profits is to carry them to the canteen fund, where the men can get the direct benefit from them, and see for themselves how the money is applied. I do not mean to suggest that the discretion of Commanding Officers in the administration of regimental funds is not, in the majority of cases, well exercised, but human beings occasionally lack discretion, and C.O.s are human beings.

Reference was recently made in TRUTH to some of the grievances of the men employed as draughtsmen at Chatham Dockyard. Apparently what was then said applies equally to Devonport, where the objectionable system of employing men permanently on the footing of temporary or acting draughtsmen is in full swing. It is one of the grievances of the men employed in this way that out of their exiguous pay they have to furnish themselves with pens, drawing pins, blackleads, and all the paraphernalia of their craft; and this state of things has recently culminated in their being called upon to buy their own Indian ink. It appears that a meagre supply of Indian ink was drawn last June, but owing to the heavy work that has been going on lately, the stock only lasted about three months, and a notification has now been issued that no more can be allowed, and that the men will have to furnish themselves with Indian ink for the rest of the year. This kind of cheese-paring passes, I suppose, at Whitehall for economy; but considering that My Lords manage to spend some nineteen or twenty millions per annum upon the Navy, and that their expenditure is marked on all points by muddling and extravagance, their conduct in calling upon underpaid men at the bottom of the Service to supply the country out of their own pockets with a few shillings' worth of Indian ink will strike most people as the meanest and most contemptible sweating.

I would advise the Admiralty to look at home, and see if they cannot do something to curtail the expenditure on ink, pens, and paper in their own offices. A pretty sensation would be caused in and around Whitehall if all heads and employees in Government Departments were required to supply their own writing materials. This country spent last year on stationery for Government purposes a little trifle of £627,337, and everybody knows that a substantial portion of this sum was utilised for the private purposes of Government officials. And yet here we have a poor devil employed in a draughtsman's office at Chatham or Devonport, at a few shillings a week, ordered to supply the office for eight months with Indian ink at his own expense!

A tradesman at Cape Town poured into my ear the other day a somewhat formidable indictment of the Cape Shipping Companies, on the ground of the excessive freights charged for merchandise between England and the Colony. I have made some inquiries into this matter, and although there appears to be no doubt that freights to the Cape are abnormally high, there seems to be one reasonable explanation of this in the fact that the exports from the Cape homewards are so limited that many steamers have to come home in ballast, so that the freight on the outward journey practically has to cover the two voyages. The gentleman who called my attention to the matter alluded to the rapid development of American trade to the Cape, which he attributed to the excessive freights charged by British Steam Companies. I cannot say what truth there may be in this, but the principal English Company repudiates the suggestion altogether, and asserts that its own freights are always adjusted to meet American competition. Possibly the development of American trade may be due to other causes than superior facilities in regard to carriage by sea.

The crew of H.M.S. Hood, who arrived at Portsmouth on September 20 in H.M.S. Nelson, were treated by the authorities, either of the ship or the port, with the most discreditable want of consideration. There had been a doubt as to whether they would be required to coal the ship before leaving her, but early on the Monday morning orders were given to return hammocks and mess gear, and to pack baggage, and generally to get ready for going ashore. This the men did, and, of course, dressed themselves in their shore-going clothes; but after the baggage had been inspected by the Customs officers, and some of it despatched to the railway station, an order was received to coal the ship before the crew left. The men had consequently to go to work on this dirty job, the nature of which every one who has seen it can realise, in their best clothes, the dirt being aggravated by the fact that it was raining hard at the time; and they ultimately left the ship wet to the skin, and in the condition of coal porters at the conclusion of a day's work. A pretty way, truly, of landing sailors in their native country after a long spell of foreign service! The Admiralty will share the blame of this proceeding if they do not order some inquiry into it, and severely reprimand the officer responsible.

Never has there been seen a more fortunate officer in the British Navy than Sir Michael Culme-Seymour. As Horace Walpole said of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, Sir Michael has fastened himself to the wheel of fortune, and he rolls along with it. It has been settled that in June next Sir Michael Culme-Seymour is to replace Sir Nowell Salmon as Commander-in-Chief at Portsmouth, this being the "blue ribbon" appointment of the Navy. This will be a pleasing wind-up to Sir Michael's Service career, following the Pacific command, the Channel command and, finally, the Mediterranean command, with the almost unprecedented favour of an extension.

The other day I received a letter from a Service correspondent in India—Heaven forbid that I should hint on what subject—the writer of which was in such mortal terror of any indication being given of the source of the information he conveyed, that he even went so far as to adjure me, if I could not insure him against identification, to destroy his correspondence and forget all about it; while he implored me on no account to address a letter to him. Rather than run the risk of getting this nervous gentleman into trouble, I have made a bonfire of all his documents, and I only refer to the matter as an evidence of the deadly terror which officialdom manages to inspire in some of its subordinates. No wonder it is so difficult to get at the truth of what goes on in Government circles! The subjects of the Great Assassin, as I believe he is now called, could hardly entertain a more abject fear of their Sovereign.

On several occasions during the past two or three years I have dealt with the iniquitous system of coolie-recruiting for the Assam tea-plantations which is carried on in Bengal. My statements have always produced a crop of contradictions from parties more or less interested in the supply of cheap labour for the tea plantations, but, having perfect confidence in my sources of information, I have always refused to accept these contradictions. I am now able to quote an official document which proves up to the hilt the truth of everything that I have said on the subject. The writer is the Hon. Mr. Grimley, now, I believe, a member of the Viceroy's Council, and late Commissioner of Chota Nagpur, the district from which most of the coolies are obtained. The document is printed as an appendix to the report of the Indian Labour Commission. Mr. Grimley reminds the Commission of the representations he made to the Government of Bengal in 1890, when he pointed out that "cruelties, oppressions, and frauds" had sprung up which had turned the system of (so-called) free emigration into "nothing more or less than a form of slave trade." Free emigration, he wrote, at that time had not worked in the manner contemplated, "owing to a lawless body of men termed arkatis, who are frequently released convicts or men of doubtful character, who have seized the occasion, and, owing to the high bonuses which coolies command, have utilised it in enriching themselves while practising a species of slavery." Mr. Grimley goes on to state that, far from having been altered by what has occurred since 1890, his views have been confirmed by the multiplication and extension of the abuses to which he alluded. He submits to the Commission a detailed account by a missionary of some of the evils of the traffic, which he thus summarises:—

> Seduction of girls and women, married and unmarried, abducting, kidnapping, the disruption of family ties, the sale of sons by fathers, wives by husbands, brothers by brothers, the gratification of private enmities, the abuse of authority, as when a landholder or village headman gets rid of an obnoxious ryot, the corruption of the police, and the general lowering of the morality of all persons mixed up in the business of recruitment.

In the face of this statement by the late chief official in Chota Nagpur, what becomes of our proud boast that slavery cannot exist under the British flag? Here in India, in a district within a day's railway journey of Calcutta, is a slave trade which is allowed to continue year after year in spite of repeated protests and repeated exposures of its abominable character by the local representatives of the Bengal Government—I say representatives because I happen to know that Mr. Grimley is not the only responsible officer who has spoken out his mind on the matter. How much longer is the scandal to go on? I gather from the Calcutta Statesman that there is a prospect of some fresh legislation on the question, though that paper seems to doubt whether it will be adequate to the occasion. But after this last report by Mr. Grimley the Bengal Government will surely not dare to further delay the drastic measures which are required to put an end to this coolie-catching business and the atrocities by which it is attended. If they should so far fail in their duty, the House of Commons will have to be asked what it has to say to a state of things so disgraceful to British rule.

The Madras Mail has devoted an article to a recent paragraph in TRUTH respecting the telegraph office at Madras, but it has ingeniously, though not very ingenuously, refrained from answering the question which formed the gist of the paragraph. Although a great parade was made in the article of correcting my information, the facts seem, even from the statements of the Madras Mail, to be precisely as stated in TRUTH; that is to say, the Superintendent of the Madras Division and an Assistant-Superintendent are occupying rooms in the telegraph office, from which office the unmarried signallers were recently ejected. It is also stated, as I suggested, that they are there in the character of guests of the Superintendent of the office. They have been so residing now for some months, and up to three weeks ago there was no indication of their terminating their visit. The question, therefore, that now requires answering is whether these two gentlemen are at the same time drawing lodging allowance from the Government; and, if so, whether their so doing is considered by the Government compatible with their residing as guests, or any other character, in a Government building?

A Service correspondent sends me from India the following verses, which he states were found in sweeping out the Nowhereabad United Service Club. As they seem very much to the point at this moment, I am glad to assist in rescuing them from oblivion:—

Twinkle, twinkle, little star,
How I wonder what you're for!
Hanging on the breast so high,
Like a D.S.O. you lie!

When the blazing sun is gone,
And no battle has been won,
Then you show your brilliant light.
Just as if there'd been a fight.

Then the warrior in the park
Thanks you for your ribbon dark.
Could he pose as a hero,
If it weren't for you? Oh, no!

A lady asks me if I will not give my help in order to protect decent women from being annoyed by receiving, in open envelopes, offensive circulars such as one which she forwards. If the lady in question were a regular reader of TRUTH, she would know that I have been doing my best in this direction for years past. The only person, however, whose help in this matter can be really efficacious is the Postmaster-General, and I would strongly urge upon those who send me samples of this kind of literature that they should address themselves directly to the Duke of Norfolk. It is certainly a monstrous thing that while any ordinary individual who distributes by hand offensive advertisements is liable to penal consequences, the agents of the Postmaster-General should be free to deluge private houses with filth of this description. Are we really to take it that the Post Office and the Treasury between them consider the revenue derived from this traffic too valuable to be surrendered? It is difficult to see any other argument which can be used in defence of their obstinate refusal to take action in the matter.

Some there may be among the readers of TRUTH who think that I devote an undue amount of space to this question of postal advertisements. If such there be, I wish that they could see the heaps of objectionable advertisements of one kind and another which are forwarded to this office every week by the recipients. The law has just dealt with a gang of competition-lottery promoters who carried on their operations in Belgium. For all these men the Postmaster-General acted as agent for months and years after the nature of their circulars had been repeatedly exposed in TRUTH. He is still acting in the same way as the agent for innumerable gangs of turf-lottery swindlers who carry on their game from the same part of the world. There is but a slender difference between the form of lottery conducted by the men who were convicted at the Old Bailey a fortnight or so ago and the bogus turf gambling carried on by the advertising touts of Flushing, Middelburg, and other adjacent places. The Postmaster-General could obtain the power any moment he chose to refuse to carry circulars of this character; and, if he does not choose to do so, it seems to me that he must be considered as voluntarily acting the part of agent in every fraud committed by such means.

There is a Society of Public Analysts, which from its title would be taken to be a body of analysts holding public appointments. Can anybody tell me whether that is the basis of its constitution, or whether membership is conferred on men who are not public analysts? Also whether the admission or rejection of a candidate for membership depends purely upon the question of his professional qualifications, or whether it may be influenced by merely personal considerations on the part of a small section of the Society? In other words, are elections conducted on the lines which are usually observed in a professional organisation, or on those which are occasionally followed in social clubs? My curiosity in reference to the Society has been aroused, I may add, by a recent case which has been brought under my notice.

The stream of correspondence which I started some weeks back by an imprudent question about druggists' prices continues to flow in upon me. All sorts of explanations are put forward for the variation in prices at different shops. Here are a few to be added to those that I have previously noticed—(1) that some chemists employ highly qualified assistants and others illiterate ignoramuses, and that the wages paid by the former make it impossible for them to do business as cheaply as the latter; (2) that the druggist himself is often a highly skilled compounder, and is entitled to charge proportionately for his services; (3) that in "high-class neighbourhoods" the chemist has to pay proportionately in rent and rates, and must put up his prices accordingly, if the dwellers in such neighbourhoods desire the convenience of a high-class chemist's shop close at hand. And so on, and so on.

All these arguments may have truth in them so far as they go. But the unfortunate part about them is that they are directly at variance with the experience which prompted me to raise the question. If the difference in price is due to superiority of materials (as the Chemist and Druggist asserted the other day), is it credible that at a little chemist's shop in a country town you would find a better class of drugs than at a first-rate shop in a large seaside town; and does anybody believe that the Stores use a lower class of goods than either? Again, are the young-men assistants employed at the Stores less qualified for their work than the raw youth at the country druggist's? Finally, is it a fact that rent, rates, and taxes are highest in the little country town, lower at a fashionable seaside resort, and lowest of all in Victoria-street, Westminster? In every instance the argument used is directly at variance with notorious facts. It is strange that none of my correspondents seems to have thought of the explanation which strikes me as most plausible—namely, that the little country chemist has a monopoly and a small trade, and is consequently both tempted to put up his prices, and able to do it without risk to himself; whereas the seaside charges are kept down by competition; and the Stores, by reason of their enormous trade, are able to content themselves with a smaller profit than either. The truth of the whole matter I believe to be—and I say this after a good many inquiries into the subject—that the Stores' prices, allowing for good materials and all necessary skill in compounding, represent a very fair trade profit on the article sold, and that the other prices cited in my first reference to the subject represent an enormous profit, and are only to be defended on the principle that any tradesman is justified in charging for his goods what he finds he can get.

Among other things, I have learnt lately that in Austria there is a legal limit to the price of drugs. The legal tariff is fixed from time to time by the Guild of Chemists, and to charge more than the price thus authorised is a penal offence. There may not be any need of such a regulation in London and other large towns, where there is plenty of competition, and cheap chemists as well as dear are to be found in most neighbourhoods; but something of the kind might be to the advantage of poor people who are at the mercy of chemists like my friend who charged 1s. 9d. for what the Stores sell at 10d. It may be true that there are certain drugs different qualities of which vary enormously in price; and I am assured that, in some cases at any rate, this difference in price represents a corresponding variation in the efficacy of the drug. But against this must be set another important consideration—namely, that many drugs lose their efficacy with age, from which it follows that all such drugs will probably be had in better condition from the chemist who does a large trade at low prices than from the small man whose prices are high, and whose stock is only replenished at long intervals.

"Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" is practically exemplified by the utterances of two of the professors deputed to deliver introductory addresses at the opening of this year's Medical Session. Whilst Mr. Morton Smale, at the Dental Hospital, waxes indignant over the fact that the British public is computed to expend two millions and a-half annually in patent medicines—otherwise secret remedies—Professor Martin confides to the students of the University College Medical School that, even at the present time, most of the treatment of disease is empirical, and adds that empirical knowledge should by no means be despised. Undoubtedly both these gentlemen are honest in their beliefs, and—up to a certain point—most thinking men will be with them, for it is just as ridiculous to condemn all advertised remedies en bloc as it is to imagine that there exists a specific capable of curing everything from cataract to corns.

We hear a great deal on the subject of dipsomania from the point of view of the sober, but the views of the habitual drunkard himself are not often made public, still less taken into consideration. Special interest, therefore, attaches to a correspondence that I have lately had with some inmates of a large home for inebriates in the West of England. At this institution the rule prevails, and is strictly enforced, that "no patient be allowed outside the grounds unaccompanied by an attendant." This rule is not universally adopted in homes of this description; and in two or three of the largest of these establishments it is the regular custom to allow patients to go out for certain periods on parole.

The desirability of some such relaxation is pretty evident. The first object of a home of this kind should be curative treatment, and treatment can be of little value which does not accustom the patient to the exercise of self-control in the presence of temptation. As long as he lives in seclusion, where no possibility of obtaining intoxicants exists, or is only allowed out under the supervision of an attendant who is virtually a keeper, no chance of acquiring such self-control presents itself. This is the view put forward by patients in the Institution above referred to, and it is argued with a clearness and force which entitle the opinions of the writers to respect. I am told, among other things, that in a recent case, where a patient was discharged at the end of his agreed year of residence in this home, he instantly broke down, and demonstrated that his year of treatment had been wasted by himself returning to the Institution, and begging to be taken care of until he could communicate with his friends. While in this condition, he was induced to sign away his liberty for another year—a proceeding which, under the circumstances, seems unjustifiable from every point of view. It is absurd to keep a man for a whole year and then turn him out without having made the slightest attempt to ascertain whether his cure has been effected, that is to say, whether he has acquired that degree of self-control which it should be the business of the doctor to develop in him. It seems to me that this is a matter on which general regulations for all inebriate homes might be made by the authority licensing such establishments.

In explanation of the present crowded condition of the Metropolitan Asylums Board's hospitals, I have it from a gentleman well conversant with the facts that this state of things is in a great measure due to the hospitals being used by many who ought not to be provided for at the expense of the ratepayers. A conspicuous example of this is afforded by the fact that a member of the Board has recently had two of his own children removed to one of the hospitals for treatment. Such abuse of public institutions is a gross scandal, demanding notice from the Local Government Board—especially when, as at the present moment, a large number of poor fever patients are being nursed in their own homes, at great peril to themselves and their neighbours, for want of public hospital accommodation. Hitherto, I have supposed that the worst fault of the Asylums Board was incompetence; but if dishonesty is to be added to it, we have got the Metropolitan Board of Works scandal over again.

The orders of the Local Government Board provide that, on admission to the workhouse, paupers shall be placed in the receiving-ward until seen by the medical officer, which is to be at the earliest opportunity. According to the report of the House Committee of the Blaby Guardians, a strict adherence to this rule in a recent case would have involved the detention of a woman of seventy-eight in the receiving-ward for five days, though she was suffering from senile paralysis. The doctor, it is alleged, was sent for three times, but he failed to attend, and it was by order of the matron that the old woman was taken to her proper place in the infirmary. The Committee make other charges of laxity and remissness in his duty against the medical officer, and unless some satisfactory explanation is forthcoming from him the matter ought to be brought to the notice of the Local Government Board.

Cycling Suits are a speciality at Ulster House, Conduit-street, London, W., where Ulsters, Overcoats, and Capes are kept ready for immediate use

A year or two ago the Local Government Board issued a circular, which, among other reforms in workhouse management, strongly recommended the employment of trained nurses. In a lucid interval the Totnes Guardians fell in with this recommendation, and engaged such nurses through the offices of that admirable organisation, the Workhouse Infirmary Nursing Association. But the Guardians seem to have had a very imperfect conception of the proper duties of trained nurses, for besides attending to the sick and infirm paupers, they expected these officers to undertake such menial and not altogether pleasant work as admitting and superintending the bathing of female vagrants. The result has been that one after another five nurses have resigned within the past three months, and the Guardians have now resolved to again hand over the care of the sick to women who are not trained or certificated nurses. For the sake of the patients, I hope the Local Government Board will use its influence to prevent this backsliding on the part of the Guardians. The Board should make these Bumbles understand that workhouse nurses are not washerwomen, and the bathing of tramps is not their business.

The Ballinasloe Town Board have been greatly agitated over the visits of merry-go-rounds and similar sources of recreation to the town on the occasion of the annual fair. They had a discussion on the subject at their last meeting, one of the speakers deploring the fact that last year the proprietors of these concerns took £500 or £600 out of the town, and another hinting that such frivolous amusements must have a pernicious influence on the morals of Ballinasloe. But it eventually came out that the real objection to the merry-go-rounds was that they took people away from the public-houses. "It is a great loss," said a Mr. Meagher, "to the licensed traders; it is nothing to the drapers or grocers." Some members of the Board were apparently quite disposed to veto an entertainment of this or any other kind in the interests of the publicans, if they only had the power. Fortunately for the pleasure of the giddy-minded inhabitants of Ballinasloe, they are unable to do anything of the kind.

Much pain and indignation were caused among passengers on the Strood railway station the other day by the appearance on the platform of a convict, in charge of three or four warders, wrapped in a blanket, and apparently in a dying condition. The man was so weak that he could hardly stand, and he was carried across the line and into the train. The explanation given was that his time had expired, and that he was being conveyed to Portland in order to be formally discharged. If this was the case, it only makes the matter worse. The man was evidently not in a condition to be travelling at all, much less performing a long and tiring journey merely to satisfy the requirements of official red-tape.

The Brecon Guardians have been treating one of their officers with an amount of generosity which scarcely commends itself to many of the ratepayers, on whom the payment of the bill will devolve. Some time since the Guardians were reluctantly induced to hold an inquiry into certain complaints, which had long been rife, concerning the conduct of the workhouse master. They decided to merely caution the man, but the the matter got to the knowledge of the Local Government Board, and the Guardians were requested to forward a copy of the evidence which was taken. The request was not at first complied with; but upon its being repeated, the master sent in his resignation, and the Guardians accepted it. In view of these facts the action of the Guardians in granting this officer and his wife, the matron, a pension of £40 a year is decidedly open to criticism. There ought to have been a proper investigation by an inspector from Whitehall, and the question of the pension should have depended upon the result.

I trust that none of my readers and subscribers in the city of Gloucester will ever incur the misfortune of finding their houses on fire. Gloucester is in the position—it is to be hoped a unique one among cities of its class and size—of having nothing in the shape of a municipal fire brigade, and the only protection against fire which the citizens possess is that provided by the insurance companies. How this arrangement works in time of emergency was agreeably illustrated on a recent occasion, when a fire broke out in the neighbourhood of the town, and the engines of one of the insurance companies went to the rescue. On finding that the burning premises were insured in another company, the fire engines promptly turned back, concluding, I suppose, that the other office would do all that is required. From what I hear of the antiquated and inefficient character of the engines, it is not certain even if they had gone to work that any visible result would have followed. It will strike most outsiders as highly discreditable that such a state of things should exist in a large corporate town; but, at the same time, if the ratepayers of Gloucester prefer the chance of being burned to death in their beds to the certainty of an addition of a halfpenny or so to the rates, it is really their business more than anybody else's.

There has been a great outcry at Bury over the recent refusal of the fire brigade to go to the rescue in the case of a conflagration at a large mill outside the borough boundary. It seems that the Fire Brigade Committee of the Corporation have established a rule that the fire brigade shall not be employed outside the borough, except when called in by the owner of the property in danger. How far this rule is justifiable, may depend upon the circumstances of the case. There is, I take it, a question of payment at the bottom of it, but my impression, based on the practice in other places, is that the insurance companies, rather than the owners of the premises, are the people to pay for the services of the fire brigade in such cases.

In the Bury case, however, the owners of the property state that the fire brigade was called up first by the watchman on the premises, then by a messenger, sent by one of the principal men at the mill, and finally by the Chairman of the Local District Council. If none of these parties is considered to have authority to engage the services of the fire brigade, the rules of the Corporation might just as well say at once that the brigade shall not go outside the boundary on any conditions. Fires at places of business occur, more often than not, in the absence of the principals, and to wait for one of these to give an express order for the employment of the brigade would generally mean the destruction of the premises. Any representative of the firm who happened to be on the spot ought to be considered empowered to call the fire brigade when wanted. There is, I believe, a large district, of a more or less urban character, and containing much valuable property, lying immediately beyond the borough boundary of Bury; and the moral of the case seems to be that this district had better take measures for its own protection in the case of fire. Possibly the rule of the Borough Corporation may have been intended to point this moral.

Some of the Edinburgh people are clamouring for pious representatives on their Town Council. This seems to be a recrudescence of the idiotic bray of half a century ago for "Christian representation for Christian constituencies," the main result of which was the rejection of Macaulay for Edinburgh in 1847.

The exposure of the iniquities of the Kilburn Sisters has deprived a great many benevolent people of a convenient means of contributing their cast-off clothing to the cause of charity. Many of my readers, therefore, will probably be interested to hear that the Hackney Vestry are appealing to the public for old boots and clothing, for the use of the unemployed attending their Labour Bureau in search of work. Mr. R. Taylor, chairman of the Labour Bureau Committee, who writes to me on this subject, remarks that in dealing with the unemployed difficulty, nothing is more sad than to witness the sufferings of the men in cold weather while waiting about for hours in hope of work with insufficient clothing. The Vestry have no power to provide the poor with clothes, but any private citizens who will come to the rescue will have the satisfaction of knowing that the clothing is given to those who really want it. There is no probability here, as there is at the Kilburn depots, of the clothes being sold to those who can afford to buy at an ordinary shop, and of the proceeds being applied to some purpose undisclosed. I should add that Mr. Taylor promises to acknowledge any parcels sent to him at 153, Mare-street, Hackney.

It is a beautiful and refreshing sight to see any citizen fighting hard for the privilege of being allowed to serve as a special juror. This impressive spectacle was witnessed last week at Stonehouse Petty Sessions. Somebody had cruelly objected to the inclusion of the name of Mr. Charles Curtis, managing director of a local firm of cloth manufacturers, on the list of special jurors, and Mr. Charles Curtis—in view of what follows I should perhaps say Charles Curtis, Esq.—appeared by his solicitor to maintain his right to that proud position. The arguments used on his behalf were in every way worthy of the occasion. Said his counsel:—

> He was the owner of Field House and grounds, and also possessed a large property at Cainscross, known as the Elmfield Estate. In addition, he was entitled to be called an Esquire, which was another qualification, because he had with him an order of the Charity Commissioners designating him by that term. . . . He was treasurer and trustee of the Cainscross Schools, a rural district councillor, a Delegate from Mid-Gloucester to the Western Union of Conservative Associations, one of the managers of the Randwick Schools, and Hon. Colonel of the Church Lads' Brigade. . . . On the question of Mr. Curtis being a merchant, he ought to say, perhaps, that in the City of London—a rather large place—he was elected Chairman of the Clothing Institution. . . .

Everybody will rejoice to hear that the possessor of this noble array of distinctions was decided by the Bench to be qualified to serve his country in the jury-box. When a man is not only an R.D.C., a D.M.G.W.U.C.A., and a C.C.I., but also a Colonel of the Church Lads' Brigade, and an Esquire by order of the Charity Commissioners, how any inferior mortal could have had the courage to suggest that he is not qualified to serve as a special juror passes my comprehension. If the result of this important case had been different, I should have recommended the gallant Colonel of the Church Lads' Brigade to come and take up his residence in town, where no living soul will ever object to his serving on a special jury whenever and wherever he pleases. On the other hand, it may be that an Esquire by order of the Charity Commissioners, Rural District Councillor, D.M.G.W.U.C.A., Honorary Colonel of the Church Lads' Brigade, and Chairman of the Clothing Institution, is a bigger man in his own village than he would be in "that rather large place," London.

Among the innumerable suggestions that have been made for the celebration of the Queen's record reign, I have seen none equal in boldness and originality to the proposal that a correspondent has just submitted to me. In all seriousness he argues that nothing could more usefully crown and commemorate the achievements of the present reign than the disestablishment of the amateur magistracy, whose shallow-pated incompetence has made them the despair of the nation and the butt of the satirist from the days of Elizabeth down to those of Victoria. Need I say that I cordially agree with this?

Particulars have been laid before me of a fatal miscarriage of justice which reflects great discredit upon several Scotch judicial functionaries, the Lord Advocate at their head. In November last a lad named James Hunter was charged with four others in the Sheriff's Court of Dumbartonshire with trespassing in pursuit of game. The four other lads were prepared to swear that Hunter was not with them on the occasion in question. That being so, the solicitor employed by Hunter's father to defend him applied to the Sheriff, Gebbie by name, that his client, who pleaded "not guilty," might be tried separately, so that the evidence of the other defendants, who pleaded guilty, might be available on his behalf. The Sheriff not only refused this application, but went out of his way to threaten that if the plea of not guilty on Hunter's part was persisted in, he might think it his duty to impose a fine, if not the full penalty, on all the defendants, instead of letting them off with an admonition, as he had otherwise intended doing. This is a good example of a judicial frame of mind to begin with.

The plea of "not guilty" was, nevertheless, persisted in. Two policemen and a gamekeeper, who were called as witnesses for the prosecution, swore that they had seen Hunter with the other lads on the occasion of the trespass. On Hunter's behalf a man named Paterson was then called, who swore that he, and not Hunter, was the fifth party who was with the other four defendants at the time in question. Notwithstanding this evidence —strong enough in all conscience to raise a strong doubt, of which Hunter was entitled to the benefit—all the defendants were convicted; and, while the others were let off with an admonition, Hunter was fined £1—an exhibition of judicial animus which formed a fitting sequel to the utterance of the Sheriff at the outset of the proceedings.

Hunter's father then obtained depositions from all the other defendants in whose company his son was alleged to have been, denying that he was with them on the day of the trespass. Evidence of several other witnesses was also obtained proving an alibi, in addition to the evidence of the witness Paterson given at the trial. In all, twelve witnesses were produced, who combined to rebut the evidence of the two constables and the gamekeeper as to the identity of Hunter. This irresistible case Mr. Hunter, sen., laid before the Procurator-Fiscal, and called upon him to prosecute the two constables and the gamekeeper for perjury. The Procurator-Fiscal declined to move. Mr. Hunter then determined to undertake a prosecution himself, but before he could do this it was necessary to obtain the consent of the Lord Advocate, and that functionary, before giving his consent, applied to the Procurator-Fiscal for a report on the facts. As a matter of course, the Procurator-Fiscal, who had himself declined to proceed in the matter, made an unfavourable report, and the Lord Advocate refused his consent. The last possibility, therefore, of rectifying the mistake made at the trial and relieving Hunter of the false charge made against him was thus barred. The performance of the Lord Advocate in referring the matter to the judgment of the Procurator-Fiscal, who had already given his decision upon it, is a solemn farce, which makes the law and its administrators ridiculous. The conduct of the Fiscal in refusing to prosecute can only have been prompted by a desire to shield the police from a charge against which they would have found it difficult to defend themselves. The conduct of Sheriff Gebbie is worthy of any judicial ignoramus among the unpaid magistracy, and the whole business is a satire on the administration of justice.

Hitherto I have looked upon our Game Laws as an unsurpassed monument of legislative ingenuity in the manufacture of offences and piling up of penalties. It seems, however, that the English Parliament has been beaten hollow by the Jersey States. Last week one Aimable Désiré Le Cocq was brought before John Vaudin, Esq., magistrate, at Jersey, charged with infringing "several articles of the law" by being found shooting on the property of Sir James Godfray about five o'clock on a Saturday morning. The only witness for the prosecution was a man employed by Sir James, and the accused called a witness to show that he was in bed at the time. But the magistrate said he must believe the evidence of "an entirely disinterested witness such as Sir James's servant," and he consequently found the accused guilty of the following offences:—(1) Shooting at a prohibited time, namely, before October 1; (2) shooting on a Saturday, this being market day; (3) shooting during the night, which might be understood to extend from nine p.m. to six a.m.; and (4) shooting without the necessary licence. For each of these four crimes a separate fine was inflicted, and in default of payment of the total amount of £4. 9s. 3½d., the accused went to gaol for eight days. I have come across many fearful and wonderful instances of Jersey law and magistrate Vaudin's justice; but I think this case fairly beats the record.

As to the way in which the English Game Laws are administered, an excellent illustration was given the other day at Wareham Petty Sessions. Two men named Harris and Greenslade were charged with night poaching, and three gamekeepers deposed that they saw the defendants in a field with a terrier dog, that they had bags in their possession, and that two rabbit nets were afterwards found on the ground. In cross-examination, each of these witnesses for the prosecution expressed the opinion that the defendants "were there for rabbits, and nothing else." The Chairman (Mr. J. B. Dugdale) "rather impatiently" asked what this mattered. The solicitor for the defence was constrained to point out that it mattered a great deal. As any magistrate fit for his position would have known, the second part of sec. 1 of the Act 9 Geo. IV., cap. 69, under which the charge was made, does not extend to rabbits, and if the defendants were only on the land for the purpose of taking rabbits they could not be rightly convicted.

To further enlighten the Bench, the solicitor quoted cases in which justices convicting in such circumstances have been mulcted in damages for false imprisonment. But the Wareham J.P.s are apparently a law unto themselves, caring no more for the words of an Act or the decisions of superior courts than they do for the evidence before them. The Chairman actually protested against the solicitor's quotation of cases as an attempt to intimidate the Bench, and, in flat contradiction of the statements on oath of the witnesses for the prosecution, their worships expressed their own opinion that the defendants were on the ground "for what they could get," and committed both of them to prison. There is to be an appeal to Quarter Sessions on behalf of Greenslade, and I shall be interested to see what their fellow-justices have to say to this extraordinary decision of the worthy Dugdale and his colleagues.

Not before it was time, the Glasgow Mail has administered a vigorous drubbing to the local magistrates, and, indeed, the Scotch magistracy generally, for the monstrous lenity which they constantly show in dealing with violent assaults. But, as may be seen from my Legal Pillory every week, the failure to mete out just and salutary punishment for savage wife-beating and other outrages is not a peculiar characteristic of the Scotch Bailie. The English J.P. appears equally reluctant to visit such crimes with the imprisonment which they deserve, and it is certainly not for lack of encouragement if the offenders do not come to look upon their ebullitions of ruffianism as mere venial breaches of the law, which they are at liberty to indulge in whenever they please on payment of some more or less trumpery contribution to the borough or county funds. Unfortunately the magisterial stock of mercy seems to be exhausted by cases of this kind; at any rate, none is forthcoming for defendants convicted of poaching, petty larceny, and vagrancy by begging alms or sleeping out. In regard to the following list, I should explain that the case from the Sheffield Police-court has been included not because I take exception to the sending of the prisoner to a reformatory, but because I consider it a cruel and stupid thing to decree that he shall first go to gaol for a fortnight. Surely the worthy Chairman, as an M.P. himself, ought to know that an Act was passed three years ago for the purpose of putting an end to this preliminary imprisonment of candidates for reformatories :—

Glasgow Eastern Police-court. Before Bailie McKellar. Robert Hislop, charged with assaulting a man and woman named Charcot. Defendant went to the complainants' house, and brutally and unmercifully beat the woman, knocking several of her teeth out, and, on her husband going to her protection, he was also severely ill-treated. It seemed that Hislop was incensed with Mrs. Charcot because she had sheltered his mother-in-law, an old woman of seventy, for a couple of nights. Fined £2. 2s.

Glasgow Eastern Police-court. Before Bailie Walter Wilson. Robert Wilson, pleaded guilty to a charge of assaulting his wife by beating and kicking her, knocking her down and dragging her about by the hair of her head. Fined £3 3s.

Barnsley Police-court. Before Messrs. T. Norton, S. Seal, H. Pigott, W. Ewart, and Colonel Neville. Edward Webster, miner, charged with assaulting Samuel Saxby. Defendant was brutally ill-treating an old man, and complainant tried to stop him. He then struck complainant on the back of the head with a poker, stunning him, and causing him to bleed profusely. The Bench said it was a very bad assault—there might have been murder. Fined 20s. and costs, or one month.

Govan Police court. Before Bailie Hutcheson. John Harkins, convicted of assaulting his wife by striking her on the head with a poker, inflicting a large wound. The Bailie said the offence was a very serious one. Fined 21s.

Jedburgh Sheriff-court. Before Sheriff Speirs. Walter Dryden and Joseph Park, convicted of being found on the highway, with two hares and four nets in their possession. Fined £5 each.

George Thomson and George Pirie, convicted of being found on the road with a stake-net in their possession. Fined £5 each.

Grimsby Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor, Messrs. W. Jackson, C. Morton,— Louth and G. S. Letten. Henry Walter Izzard and James Brown, fishing apprentices, charged with disobedience by neglecting to go to sea. Izzard 14 days; Brown 21 days.

Barnsley Police-court. Before the same magistrates. George Brown, a wretched-looking old man, charged with begging. One month.

Clay Cross Petty Sessions. Before Mr. W. B. M. Jackson, and other magistrates. Joseph Allen, convicted of sleeping out, and being without visible means of subsistence. Fourteen days.

Mark Cross Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. L. Hogg, A. G. Watson, H. G. Dixon, and Sir J. Staunfeld. George Jabez Collins, aged 79, charged with stealing three rashers of bacon. Seven days.

Greenock Police-court. Before Bailie Watson. William Donnachie, charged with assaulting a woman by striking her on the face, knocking her down, and kicking her. Fined £2.

Barry Police-court. Before Major-General Lee, Dr. Trehearne, Messrs. J. P. Thompson, and W. W. Nell. William Bryant, convicted of cruelty to a horse. The animal, an aged brown mare, in a wretchedly emaciated condition, was found starving on a piece of waste ground, where she could obtain no food or water. Fined £2 and costs.

Birmingham Police-court. Before Messrs. Colmore, Pollack, Hodder, Ludlow, J. F. Cartland, and Dr. Griffiths. Isaac Radford, charged with assaulting his wife. He dragged her about by the hair, knocked her down, and struck her on the head with a belt, inflicting a wound over the right eye. The constable who arrested prisoner said he behaved like a madman. Fined £2 and costs.

West Riding Police-court, Bradford. Charles Hainsworth, convicted of assaulting his wife. The woman said she had been persistently ill-treated, and on the occasion in question defendant attempted to throttle her, and threw her out of the house. Last June he was bound over for assaulting her, and he had been twice imprisoned for neglect of family. Fined £2 and costs, and again bound over.

Honiton County Police-court. Before Mr. J. Ashley. Frederick Hurford, charged with wandering abroad and lodging in an outhouse, having no visible means of subsistence. Twenty-one days.

Northwich Police-court. Thomas Young and Emmanuel Hankey charged with being found with fifteen rabbits and a number of nets in their possession. Fined £5 each and costs, and in default of payment committed for two months.

Wisbech Police-court. Before Aldermen Groom and Goward and Mr. W. M. Boulton. Samuel Neal, charged with absconding from the workhouse on June 8. Two months.

Bourne Police-court. Before Colonel Reynardson and other Justices. James Carrington, charged with stealing a pair of boots. Three months.

Needham Market Petty Sessions. Before General W. G. Martin and other Justices. Charles Maidwell, charged with poaching. He was found in possession of three nets, a ferret, and a rabbit. According to a letter from his employer he had been in regular employment since 1882. Two months, and a further six months in default of finding sureties.

Sheffield City Police-court. Before Sir F. Mappin, M.P., and Mr. W. W. Harrison. Frederick Abbott, a boy of 13, convicted of stealing 8s. 6d. belonging to his father. Fourteen days' imprisonment, to be followed by five years in a reformatory.

A shocking case of cruelty to a horse was recently brought before the Bristol magistrates, the evidence showing that the animal had been engaged to convey a party of men in a waggonette to Weston-super-Mare, and that it was kept without food for twelve hours, beaten and overdriven, with the result that it died from exhaustion. The driver was very properly sentenced to six weeks' hard labour, and a local correspondent suggests that if they had met with their deserts the half-dozen men who formed the party would also have been punished. In regard to one of them, who was summoned with the driver, it was urged that he "knew nothing about horses," and the charge against him was dismissed. I cannot but remark, however, that he and his companions must have been exceptionally dense and ignorant if they could not see that the wretched horse was being ill-treated; and the fact that, so far as the reports show, this ill-treatment was allowed to continue without a word of remonstrance from any of them, speaks badly for their intelligence and their humanity.

When I referred two or three weeks back to the case in which Princess Sophia Duleep Singh was fined at Burton for driving out with an unmuzzled lap dog in her carriage, I rather sympathised with the lady, though I did not see how the conviction could have been avoided. It would seem, however, that Princess Duleep Singh pays scant respect to any regulation which does not meet with her approval, for she has now been summoned before the Swadlincote magistrates for a second similar offence committed the day after she was fined at Burton. However much she dislikes it, even the Princess Duleep Singh must be taught to obey the law, and, as she deliberately disregarded the first lesson which she received, the Bench might well have enforced the second by imposing a more substantial penalty than a fine of two shillings and costs.

Reginald Edmund Sandiland Savage should consider himself a very lucky person. He was charged at the Guildhall on Friday with frequenting several banks in the City for an unlawful purpose, and the evidence was to the effect that at several of these establishments he had endeavoured to cash a worthless cheque for £91. Originally a cheque for £1 had been given to him by some one, but after it came into his possession the amount was altered by the addition of the figure 9. It transpired that the prisoner is a retired Colonel, with friends in a good position, and on learning that a passage to South Africa had been booked for him, Alderman Truscott was kind enough to allow the man to go. Would the Alder man have been equally merciful if the prisoner had been some poor wretch without the advantage of being well connected? I hope he would; but I must confess that some of the sentences that are occasionally passed on such offenders at the Guildhall make me rather doubtful about it.

I find that an individual, or gang, going by the name of Linton, McKenzie, Dyer, & Co., of Adelaide-street, Charing Cross, is still circulating wholesale a pretended extract from TRUTH, implying that I have recognised the possibility of devising a system of punting at Monte Carlo which will yield 15 per cent. profit, and work uniformly. As I stated on a former occasion, this suggestion on the part of Linton, McKenzie, Dyer, & Co. is an impudent fiction. The paragraph from TRUTH which these people profess to quote on their circular, although the words used are garbled, conveyed precisely the opposite opinion to that which its reproduction on the circular is intended to convey. It was, in fact, a paragraph ridiculing the professions of a gentleman who professed to have discovered a system which would ensure the results mentioned.

Linton, McKenzie, Dyer, & Co. are one of the touting gangs who invite the public to trust them with cash for the purpose of working their own infallible system; and the fact that they use a gross misrepresentation of this kind in support of their appeals for money ought to be a sufficient reason with every intelligent person for not trusting them with a halfpenny on any account. The pretended extract from TRUTH on this particular circular occurs among a batch of quotations from different papers, including the Financial News and the Daily Telegraph, and it would not surprise me in the least to find that these journals are misrepresented in much the same way as TRUTH is.

No reader of TRUTH who profits by his study of these columns ever pays the traditional 3s. 6d. demanded by a debt-collecting solicitor, as the price of a request to settle his client's bill. I trust that this applies equally to similar demands when made by lay debt-collectors. A good instance of the latter kind is furnished by a legal friend of mine, who by an oversight had allowed a trifle of 4s. 6d. to remain overdue from him to a cycle company. The debt was placed in the hands of a well-known firm of collectors, who demanded 1s. 6d for themselves at the same time as the 4s. 6d. for their clients. The debtor sent with the 4s. 6d. a peremptory refusal to pay a penny more, and heard no more about the 1s. 6d. Nor will any one else who takes the same course. The proper person to pay a debt collector is the party who employs him. And he generally does.

Have F. Paynter & Co., of Albert House, St. Mary Church, Torquay, found imitators and competitors in their own town, or do they now run a second business as M. Truscott & Co., of Glendower, Tor Vale, Torquay? The latter, at any rate, are busily working the advertising dodge for which Paynter & Co. have long been notorious, and the modus operandi of the two firms, even to the wording of their advertisements and circulars, is practically the same. The dodge, as I have often explained, is to advertise that a weekly salary of 7s. 6d. or 10s. 6d. and upwards can easily be earned in spare time; and to ask those who respond to this attractive offer to remit 1s. 1½d. for "the necessary sample for the work." This consists of a rubber stamp, pencil, and penholder, and it turns out that the weekly salary is to be obtained by the sale on commission of similar articles. The whole thing is a gross deception, and it is mostly practised at the expense of necessitous individuals, who can ill-afford to throw away their money on the articles which they are thus beguiled into buying. To all who are so duped, I commend the course adopted by a recent applicant for employment to Truscott & Co., who at once returned the "sample" and demanded his money back, under a threat to expose their methods. Truscott & Co. deemed it judicious to comply with this demand, and if everybody who is tricked would deal with these gentry in the same way there would soon be an end to a game which, judging from the number of firms engaged in it, is at present extremely lucrative.

Another impudent trick is being worked by a man calling himself "The Advertisers' Association," of 7, Leicester-street, Southport, who advertises for "parties to distribute circulars; 10s. per 1,000 paid." This individual's system of "employing young men" is to befool them into the payment of an "initial fee" of 12s. 6d. for the privilege of membership of his precious association and an "outfit" consisting of a list of advertising firms, and 300 circulars and envelopes with which to solicit their orders. Anybody possessed of a modicum of intelligence would see through the swindle at once; but the supply of simpletons is so large that I dare say this "Advertisers' Association" is reaping a goodly harvest of twelve and sixpences.

By the way, I notice that the Commissioner of Police has just issued a caution to the public against a number of frauds, including specious offers of "home employment" and "sleeping partnerships" (in betting systems), various so-called puzzle competitions, and the transparent fictions of our venerable friend, the Spanish prisoner. It is very good of the Commissioner to give us these warnings, but would it not be more to the purpose to see whether some of the swindlers he refers to cannot be brought to justice? Take, for instance, the "home employment" business. For two or three years past I have been directing attention to the barefaced swindle, run by one F. J. Mason, of Oswestry, who has extensively advertised in all parts of the country his offers of "home employment for plain writers." He has been allowed to carry on his business with impunity in England, and it has been left for an officer of the Irish Constabulary to take proceedings against him, with the result that at Tobercurry Petty Sessions a few days since the magistrates committed him to the Assizes for trial. It is significant that since his committal Mason & Co., alias Mason, Smith, & Co., of 145, Fleet-street, who were engaged in precisely the same line, have suddenly suspended their operations, announcing that the worthless book of recipes, which was all their victims got for their shillings, is now out of stock. But though the Scotland-yard authorities have been forestalled by the Irish police so far as Mason is concerned, there are still plenty of rogues of the same class left for them to deal with.

> WANTED good LADIES' SCHOOL (within one hour Bournemouth) for orphan daughter (age 16) of medical man. £15 p. a. only can be offered. No other schools need reply.—A., 9, York-road, Tunbridge Wells.

No. 9, York-road, Tunbridge Wells, is the address of Mrs. A. M. Thompson, of whose history a full account was given in TRUTH of July 23. The lady is the widow of a medical gentleman at Beverley, who for about twelve years past has supported herself, and managed to educate and start her children in life, by systematic begging-letter writing. What may be the precise drift of the above advertisement it is impossible to say, but presumably it has some connection with the appeals which Mrs. Thompson has lately been making to the public for the means of educating the youngest of her daughters; and as several other advertisements from the same address have lately appeared in the same paper, it would seem that the proceeds of the begging-letter business are sufficient to provide the lady with ample funds for advertising purposes. It may, therefore, be desirable to warn benevolent people once again against encouraging Mrs. Thompson in any way, unless after the fullest and most satisfactory investigation of her claims to charity.

A reference in a recent issue of TRUTH to the operations of a turf-gambling tout named Miller, who asks for money to work what he calls his "Perfection" system, brought me, strange to say, two testimonials in favour of this Miller. The writer of one was a Mrs. Gibson, who wrote from 114, Wickham-road, Brockley, to inform me that she had been speculating under Miller's auspices for some time, and had every reason to be satisfied with the result. The other was from a Mr. H. B. Campbell, of Wadworth, Tick Hill, whose letter was to the effect that the "Perfection" system is so perfect that it can only come to grief in the event of such a continuous run against favourites as has only happened once in the last seven years. Unfortunately, Miller himself has inopportunely refuted this assertion. Last week he issued a circular to clients whose investments with him dated prior to September 15, notifying that "owing to the adverse run experienced since that date, the four sequences of capital have been lost." He does not say anything about the "adverse run" having but one precedent in the last seven years, nor has anything of the kind happened. The "Perfection system," in fact, has not broken down at all. Its "perfection," I take it, consists in its efficiency as a means of parting fools from their money, and in this respect it remains perfect to the last.

The Mr. Campbell quoted above kindly gave me his opinion that the writer of my last paragraph on Miller did not know what he was talking about. I happen to know one or two things, however, which Mr. Campbell may or may not know. One of them is that operators of the Miller stamp always make it a rule to pay one or two customers regularly, generally Army men or others in a good position, to whom they may refer any one who asks for proof of the genuineness of the thing. Whether intentionally or not, such people virtually act as decoys, and make a very good thing out of it. Another thing I know is that it is a common trick of the Miller fraternity to go on paying the winnings for a time, and encourage their victims to increase their stakes until they reach a big amount, much as you may see an operator at the three-card trick allow a greenhorn to win two or three shillings in succession, in order to inspire him with the confidence necessary to plank down a sovereign. It is when the stake has been increased to a substantial sum that your "Perfection" system generally comes to grief. This game the man Miller has played most successfully, women especially having been induced by regular remittances for a few weeks in succession (at the most, only a fraction of what they had themselves paid), to increase their investment, until as much as £100 in one case had been paid over. It is a self-evident absurdity to suggest that Miller could ever have invested on favourites the huge amounts he professed to be receiving, and any one ought to be able to see for himself that the whole business is a fraud.

There is an illustrated publication appearing once a month described as a "magazine" and "ladies' home review," which in its August issue devoted a column and a half to an advertisement of this man Miller, in what purported to be an editorial article on "The Perfection

The luxury of a bath is incomplete without the addition of SCRUBB'S CLOUDY HOUSEHOLD AMMONIA, which refreshes and exhilarates.

HOT WATER instantly, night or day. EWART'S "LIGHTNING" GEYSER. Illustrated Price Lists, with particulars of patterns adapted for every purpose, on application to Department, EWART & SON, 346, Euston-road, London, N.W.

System of Investment." This article was of course only a paid advertisement—as to all appearance are all the other articles in the same number. But unfortunately there are only too many, especially among the readers of ladies' papers, who take for gospel whatever they read in this shape, and the people who put forward advertisements in this guise are even worse enemies of the public than any of the rogues or impostors whom they puff.

Meanness and stinginess are common human infirmities, but it is astonishing that so many people are ready to advertise their possession of these qualities in the daily papers. The other day an advertisement appeared in the name of Cooper, Lloyd, & Co., 156, Westminster Bridge-road, inquiring for a young lady for an office in Westminster. The young lady was to be employed ordinarily from 9.30 a.m. till 6 p.m., on Saturdays till 1.30, but on Wednesdays till 9 p.m., for which the salary offered was 7s. per week. Whether Cooper, or Lloyd, or "Co.," or any other party in the background is responsible for this offer, it speaks little for either his generosity or humanity.

There is another form of meanness which is constantly being gibbeted in the Press—that which shows itself in paltry rewards for the restoration of valuable property. A Cheshire paper records how a drayman recently picked up a cheque for £800, and put himself to considerable trouble in restoring it to the owner, when he was rewarded with sixpence. A lost cheque is easily stopped, and may not be worth much, and the owner of this particular cheque may possibly have thought that if the drayman had torn it up he would have done all that the circumstances required. But then why give him sixpence? If the man was entitled to any reward at all, he was entitled to something commensurate with the trouble he took to restore the cheque to its proper owner.

Now, I am far from saying that anybody, whatever his rank in life, is entitled to a reward for being honest enough not to appropriate valuables found by accident, and it is a difficult matter to say on what principle such rewards, if given at all, should be measured. But seeing that nobody is under any obligation to restore chance findings of this kind—for they can always be left where found, even if not appropriated—the finder has certainly a claim to a recompense for any trouble he takes; and gratitude, if not expediency, suggests that the reward should bear some sort of proportion to the value of the property. Otherwise, the finders of lost property can hardly be expected to go out of their way to restore it to the true owner. A familiar illustration of this is to be found in the Police Regulation with regard to property left in public vehicles in London, the rule being that the finder is allowed 10 per cent. on the value as assessed by the owner. Even this rule, however, does not preclude egregious manifestations of meanness in the owner's assessment of the value. I was once told by an officer at Scotland Yard that if he could buy all the lost property brought there at the price put on it by the owners, he would speedily become a millionaire. He gave, as an instance of this, a valuable pair of opera-glasses mounted in gold and mother-of-pearl, and worth several guineas, which had been valued by the owner at fifteen shillings. I am sorry to have to record that he added that ladies are the worst offenders in this respect.

I recollect the possibilities of ramie as a raw material for textile manufactures being discussed thirty or forty years ago, but hitherto the cost of its preliminary manipulation and treatment has prevented the general utilisation of the fibre. It is now claimed, however, that all difficulties in regard to the decortication, ungumming, and spinning of the fibre have been overcome, and that there is at last a real prospect of ramie yarns being largely used in the production of various goods and fabrics. A demonstration of the new processes was given the other week at the mills of the Ramie Syndicate at Staines, and it is asserted that the only thing now necessary is to ensure a continuous supply of the fibre. This should not be difficult, as the plant can be easily grown in India, Australia, the West Indies, the Straits Settlements, and other British possessions, to say nothing of other countries, and with the substitution of a decorticating machine for manual labour, its cultivation promises to be highly profitable. The further development of the ramie industry will be watched with interest.

Consternation has been produced among the free and independent electors of the Borough of Douglas by the effect of an Act of the Manx Legislature which has lately come into force. With a view to promoting the prompt payment of the Borough rates, the Act provides that no person whose rates are not all paid up to date on August 25 shall be enrolled as a burgess for the ensuing year; and according to the Manxman the operation of this clause has resulted in the disfranchisement of about 700 voters, or nearly one-fourth of the entire number. To thus automatically deprive people of their civic rights without further notice or process, because rates just become due have not been paid on a particular date, would seem in any case to be a very strong measure, and it is certainly monstrous that such a thing should be done as it has been at Douglas without any effective steps being taken to warn the defaulting ratepayers of what was in store for them.

A contemporary, referring to the fact that Lord Cranbrook has just celebrated his eighty-second birthday, states that his lordship and the Duke of Rutland are the only members of Lord Beaconsfield's Cabinets who have attained to a considerable age. The Duke of Richmond and Gordon might be added to the list, for he is in his seventy-ninth year, and his public life commenced in 1841 (at the same time as the Duke of Rutland's), when he was elected for West Sussex, and he sat for that constituency until he went up to the House of Lords in 1860. The Duke has been a member of five Cabinets. Lord Cranbrook's public life commenced in 1856, when he was returned for Leominster.

SCRUTATOR.

BLANK CHEQUES ON BRITISH CREDIT.

IT is all very well agreeing not to convert the Turkish troubles into a party question, but before giving Lord Salisbury a blank cheque, I should like to know how he intends to fill it in. When Lord Rosebery became Prime Minister, the Radicals handed over the conduct of our foreign relations to him, and they found themselves dragged through the mire of Jingoism. During the present conjuncture he has published two letters. In the first he blamed Lord Salisbury; in the second he lauded him. When the first was published, the Government organs sneered at him as the "nominal" Liberal Leader; on the publication of the second he became the "wise and prudent" Liberal Leader. What he thinks and what he writes in no sort of way binds Radicals. Their views are embodied in Mr. Gladstone's Liverpool utterance. There are, he has explained, three courses: (1.) Isolated action; this he holds under the present conditions of Europe to be impossible. (2.) European concerted action; this means doing nothing. (3.) To withdraw our Ambassador, and to announce that henceforward neither directly nor indirectly will we concern ourselves to maintain the integrity of the Turkish Empire. This third course should be urged by all who are ashamed of our having so long subordinated humanity to a policy as iniquitous as it is foolish.

I greatly doubt whether the Government is prepared to accept Mr. Gladstone's advice. It must be remembered that Lord Salisbury nearly dragged us into war with Russia in order to enable the Turk to retain under his rule several millions of Christians, who without us would have been free men to-day; and that he negotiated the treaty which gave us Cyprus as an acknowledgment of our services to the Sultan. Why should we expect him to have so modified his views that he is now prepared to give to Russia a free hand on the Bosphorus? Yet this free hand is what Mr. Gladstone's proposal comes to. Either Christians must be oppressed and often massacred, or we must cease to use the Turk as a barrier against Russian advance to the Mediterranean. The vast mass of the electors are for the latter alternative; our "Statesmen," it would seem, are for the former. They count upon the agitation against the Turk expending itself, and upon the Turkish Empire still remaining, thanks to their attitude, the disgrace and opprobrium of civilisation for many a year. It is to be regretted that Parliament is not sitting. Were this so, Mr. Gladstone's views might be embodied in a resolution and submitted to the House of Commons. The Government would then have to accept and to act on the resolution, or to vote against it. If it did the latter, all this nonsense about leaving everything in blind confidence to Lord Salisbury would be swept aside.

There has been of late a great deal too much of this leaving everything in respect to our foreign relations to some particular Statesmen. The House of Commons is the great Court of the nation. Its duty is to superintend and to control the Executive. In foreign affairs it has entirely abrogated those duties. The Foreign Secretary is always some Peer, and he does what seems best to him. Thus we are dragged into wars, treaties, and complications in regard to which the country has had no voice. In this Turkish matter the conscience of the nation has been aroused. Ninety-nine men out of every hundred amongst us would willingly agree that Russia should be paramount in the Balkan peninsula, rather than that we should impotently regret the fearful consequences of Turkish rule there. But these ninety-nine can do nothing but protest against a policy which sacrifices our honour and our good name to a traditional illusion that the safety of the British Empire is concerned in preventing Russia from ever obtaining a free access to the Mediterranean. Meetings are being held everywhere throughout the land. These meetings will be of no avail unless we make it clear to those in office that they are our servants, not our masters. The massacres will be stopped; the Turk will promise—as he has a hundred times already promised—to govern better in future; a few paper reforms will be published; and we shall be told that the cautious wisdom of Lord Salisbury has averted a crisis, which, &c. Again will Christians in Turkey be treated worse than dogs, and this state of things will go on until once more some outburst of fanaticism will lead to another agitation against our "traditional policy." I will have nothing to do with the "confidence trick." I trust neither Lord Salisbury nor Lord Rosebery, nor any other individual, be he Peer or pauper. Mr. Gladstone has expressed my views. I want effect to be given to these views.

It is sad to think of the strong and respected position that we might have occupied had it not been for the Jingo craze which has of late had full swing, because the Liberals, instead of counteracting it as they formerly did, have been fooled by false guides into becoming its ardent votaries. There is not a Power in Europe that does not distrust us since our Egyptian and Cyprus sharp practice. This, only a few months ago, we were called upon to regard as a cause of rejoicing. It was termed "splendid isolation." Our newspapers teem with self-glorification over our valorous deeds in slaying Soudanese, Matabele, and other Africans, whose ability to resist us is about on a par with those of the pheasants which are falling in their thousands before the guns of our sportsmen. We are expanding the area of the Empire in the jungles of Central Africa, and building railroads there, instead of improving our means of communication at home.

In the meantime, our exports are falling off to the great open markets of the world, because Germany and other nations devote themselves to extending their foothold in them, instead of wasting their means in the follies which we deem conducive to our honour and our glory. In the Mediterranean we act as though we could convert it into an English lake, although what profit we should derive from this neither we, nor any one else, can understand. Our expenditure upon armaments increases yearly, and we are told that a still further increase is needed. I am a believer in the necessity of our having a powerful and effective navy. But this, as it seems to me, we already have. I would have us in a position of effective defence. But, on the other hand, I would have us neither directly nor indirectly meddle in what does not concern us. I would leave the great military Powers of the Continent to cut and carve out Europe as it may seem best to them. Our sole aim should be to keep clear of any war in which their rivalries may drag them.

So far as regards the integrity of the Turkish Empire, I should rejoice were the Turk cleared bag and baggage out of any portion of his dominions where he rules over subject Christians. If Russia, or if Russia and Austria, will undertake this clearance, Heaven forbid that we should hinder them! Nor can we have any legitimate cause for objecting to these two countries, or to one or other of them, replacing the Turk. I should deem it a cause of danger and embarrassment to us were we to secure further territory in the Levant. The less that we have to do with that corner of the world, the better it will be for us. Our action has maintained for years one of the vilest Governments that ever disgraced humanity. It is not necessary for us to move one ship, or to spend one pound, in order to put an end to this disgrace. All that we have to do in order to deprive the Sultan of all power for evil, is explicitly to declare that we shall view his downfall with the warmest approval, and that we shall seek in no way to profit by it. If our Government is not at one with us in this estimate of our duties, then we must replace it by another which, instead of defying, seeks to give practical effect to our will. Heart and soul every Radical should be with Mr. Gladstone.

THE 4TH HUSSARS SCANDAL:

THE SCANDAL STILL MORE SCANDALOUS.

The final decision of the War Office in the case of Mr. Hodge, of the 4th Hussars, is a matter of even greater public importance than that in the Bruce case. In order to appreciate this, it is desirable to remember the details of the complaint put forward by Mr. Hodge, senior, upon his son's evidence. Mr. Hodge joined the 4th Hussars in the beginning of February, and in the course of two months was literally and unquestionably bullied out of the regiment. The first intimation that the regiment did not want him was conveyed within a day or two of his joining, by a question put to him at mess as to where he intended to keep his hunters and racehorses. His reply, that he did not think his means would allow him to keep either, elicited from a captain who was present the remark, "Then what the —— did you join this regiment for?" and this seems to have been the signal for an organised attempt to make his life in the regiment intolerable for him. He was verbally insulted, and treated to spiteful ill-usage whenever opportunity occurred. His rooms were entered in his absence, the locks of his drawers and boxes forced, his property damaged, and his clothes torn up and burnt. Such methods of blackguardly persecution not achieving the desired result, he was taken out of bed at two o'clock in the morning by four of the subalterns, carried down in his night-clothes, forced into a horse-trough at one end, dragged under the cross-bars through its entire length, and pulled out at the other end, bruised, bleeding, and half-drowned. To enforce the lesson, it was repeated in all its details on the following night. He then took the advice of his father as to what he should do, and his father—himself an old Service man—came to Aldershot, and interviewed the Adjutant on the subject. The result seems to have been the cessation of the more violent forms of ruffianism, but these were replaced by a strict boycott, which was even more crushing. Mr. Hodge came home on sick leave, and his father states that he was completely broken down in health and spirit. There being apparently no hope for him in the regiment, and no possibility of redress, his papers were sent in.

That this, if accurate, is a shocking story, and disgraceful not only to the officers who took the lead in the persecution, but to all those who winked at or encouraged it, from the Colonel downwards, all who have read the original narrative in TRUTH have unanimously agreed. Unless it could be shown by adequate inquiry that these statements were untrue or overcoloured, there can be no difference of opinion among the public at large as to the necessity for the sternest repression of such misconduct. When the facts were first made public, it was pleaded on behalf of the War Office that they had no official cognisance of the facts—a questionable plea, seeing that Mr. Hodge's father had visited the War Office for the purpose of making the facts known, and had there an interview with two officials on the subject. But whatever this plea might have been worth in the first instance, it ceased to have any bearing on the case after a promise had been given to Parliament that the Commander-in-Chief and the Adjutant-General would themselves personally investigate the facts, and after Mr. Hodge's father had laid before the War Office a detailed statement of his allegations in pursuance of that promise. That being so, let us now see how the Commander-in-Chief, the Adjutant-General, and the Secretary of State for War have dealt with this case, after it had been thus officially brought to their cognisance.

To begin with, no shadow of an inquiry, in any sense deserving of the name, has taken place at all. Mr. Hodge, who, like Mr. Bruce, was away from the country at the time when the promise of inquiry was given, has had no opportunity of appearing in support of his statements, or of testing or answering any counter-statements that might be made by the men who drove him from the Army. The performance which the Commander-in-Chief and the Adjutant-General insult the public by calling an inquiry, consists in this case, as in the other, simply in collecting from the parties impugned whatever they have to say in their own defence, and offering these statements to the aggrieved parties as the result of an impartial investigation. Such a course must necessarily place the War Office in the position of an apologist for the misconduct which is complained of; but in this instance the apologetic attitude has been carried to lengths which involve the rulers of the Army in the grossest discredit. In order to show that I do not lightly use language of this nature in speaking of men in the position of the Commander-in-Chief and his colleagues, let me first ask the reader to look at the letter in which the War Office decision has been conveyed to Mr. Hodge, senior :—

War Office, London, S.W.
September 24, 1896.

Sir,—I am directed by the Secretary of State for War to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23rd August.

The Commander-in-Chief and the Adjutant-General have carefully inquired into the circumstances connected with your son's resignation of his commission in the 4th Hussars, and into the allegations as to his treatment by some of the Subalterns of the regiment.

Your son seems to have quitted England before or very soon after any complaint as to the reasons for his retirement from the Service was made, and it was therefore impossible to examine him, but enough has been elicited to admit of a decision being come to in the case.

Mr. Hodge seems to have been constitutionally unfitted for a cavalry officer. In the school, before his ride of recruits, he persistently refused to jump the bar, he held on to the saddle, cried, and finally refused to mount his horse. He also several times reported himself sick, when the medical officer could find nothing the matter with him.

It is clear that he was bullied by his brother Subalterns, and that he was the subject of some rough usage. There seems, however, to be no foundation for the allegations that this treatment was in any way due to the supposed insufficiency of his private means. It seems to have been due to the peculiarities referred to, and to the idea, not uncommon among lads of that age, that such faults can be corrected by such treatment.

This excuse is not one which the military advisers of the Secretary of State are prepared to accept. The Commander-in-Chief is fully prepared to put down bullying, wherever the existence of such a practice is brought to light, with a strong hand, and to hold officers commanding regiments responsible for the proper treatment of all officers subordinate to them.

In this case, however, the evidence does not point to any failure of duty on the part of the senior officers of the regiment.

It appears that when these practices were brought to the notice of the Adjutant of the regiment, he first expostulated with the offenders, and subsequently reported them to the Commanding Officer, who took instant steps to stop any such conduct and severely censured the officers concerned, punishing the ringleaders.

That his action was sufficiently drastic is incidentally shown by a letter from Mr. Bruce Pryce, the father of another officer in the regiment, who, writing in regard to his son's case, says that he was not ill-treated, because whenever such measures were mooted, the elder Subalterns refused to join "after what occurred in Hodge's case." (The inverted commas are his.)

Had Mr. Hodge not been unfortunately unfitted for the Service, there seems no reasonable ground for doubting that the interposition of the Colonel would have been sufficient to secure him fair treatment while he remained in the regiment; the action of the regimental authorities proved both the desire and the power to do this.

The Secretary of State for War does not consider that in the circumstances any further action is necessary in the case.—I am, sir, your obedient servant, G. Lawson.

In view of what follows, I shall confidently ask the public to join with me in pronouncing this letter the most disgraceful document of its kind ever issued from the War Office. It is disgraceful to everybody concerned in its production, first for its gross disregard of truth and its attempt to palm off as facts conclusively established mere ex parte statements entitled to no credit; and, secondly, for the shuffling and unworthy pretexts which are resorted to for refusing to take notice of misconduct the gravity of which is admitted. To begin with matters of fact, I will ask the reader next to look carefully at the following letter addressed to me by Mr. Hodge, senior :—

Duporth, St. Austell, October 2, 1896.

4th Hussars Scandal.—Hodge Case.

Dear Sir,—On July 3 I received a letter from the War Office asking me to formulate my charges, &c., &c. "When you have done this, you may rely upon the case being made the subject of a full and absolutely impartial inquiry."

Like a simpleton, I actually believed that an impartial inquiry would take place, and have remained at home for the last three months so as to be in readiness to give my evidence when required. Unfortunately for the country generally, but fortunately for the offenders and the ringleaders particularly, I have not been required, because this "absolutely impartial inquiry" has not taken place at all.

You will see by the letter to me from the War Office (which you now have) that the authorities do not intend to punish any of the offenders, for they consider the "drastic" measures taken by the Colonel at the time of the offences were sufficient. Now, I ask, what were these drastic measures that were taken? The War Office knew nothing of them; my son knew nothing of them; the Under-Secretary for War, by his statement in the House of Commons, knew nothing of them; but why? Simply because no drastic measures of punishment at all were awarded. They simply never existed, or they would have been reported by the Colonel to the War Office.

With regard to that portion of the letter from the War Office stating that my son, while in the riding-school "held on to his saddle, refused to mount his horse, and actually cried," I believe this to be an untrue statement, for it varies most glaringly from that made to me by the Adjutant when I had my interview with him. He stated to me, and this I am prepared to state on oath, that my son was "getting on well in the riding school and with his drills, and that he showed a good deal of pluck in his riding."

I have no reason whatever to doubt the word of this gentleman.

I fear that in future bullying and very questionable practices on the part of cavalry Subalterns will be allowed to go on unchecked as hitherto. For in this glaring case of bullying (with all its terrible after effects), which the authorities at the War Office now fully admit took place, there is not one word of regret; not one word of apology; not one expressed, or even implied, intention of punishing the offenders.—I beg to remain, yours very truly, Henry Hodge.

P.S.—In War Office letter, paragraph 3, it states, "Your son seems to have quitted England before or very soon after any complaint as to the reasons for his retirement from the Service was made, and it was therefore impossible to examine him," &c.

As a matter of fact, my son did not leave England for fifteen months after his retirement. Surely that was ample time for an inquiry. H. H.

Comparing these two documents, the following facts are clear :—1. The statement of the War Office that "the Commander-in-Chief and the Adjutant-General have carefully inquired" can mean nothing more than that they have obtained the answers of the officers of the regiment (the incriminated parties) to the allegations of Mr. Hodge, and have accepted their statements without giving Mr. Hodge any opportunity of replying, or testing the answers, even where they are grossly defamatory towards him. 2. The War Office has adopted and given currency to a gross slander on Mr. Hodge, obviously on the mere evidence of the men who, it admits, have already done him the foullest wrong. The evidence, indeed, in support of this slander is so rotten that the whole story about Mr. Hodge's cowardice in the riding-school is blown to the winds by the statement of the Adjutant to the father —a statement which was made immediately after the horse-trough outrage. Had the most elementary requirements of an "impartial inquiry" been observed, had even Mr. Hodge, senior, been allowed to hear what was said on the other side before a decision was arrived at, the Commander-in-Chief must have seen that, in the face of what had passed between Mr. Hodge and the Adjutant, the story would not hold water, and that to publish it on the authority of the War Office would only involve the War Office in discredit. However, the War Office have chosen to adopt this story and publish it, and the consequences must rest upon them. "Discredit," indeed, is hardly the word for the position, if, as few will doubt after Mr. Hodge's statement, the story about the riding school is simply a malignant invention. For note that, on the strength of this story, the War Office now actually pronounce Mr. Hodge to have been "constitutionally unfitted for a cavalry officer." Constitutionally unfitted! Here is a lad who has passed all the usual tests, including a strict medical examination. The War Office has granted him a commission after taking every recognised means to satisfy itself of his fitness to hold it. He serves for a few weeks only, almost from the first day of which his life is made a perfect hell for him; and now the heads of the Army, apparently in sublime unconsciousness that they stultify themselves in so doing, solemnly pronounce that he was "constitutionally unfitted" for the position to which they themselves appointed him. On what ground, pray? Apparently, in deference to the opinions of a handful of young officers, who stand charged with having driven this gentleman, by the most blackguardly ruffianism, into resigning his commission, and who pronounced him unfit for the regiment within a few days of his joining. It is true there is added to this another libel as to Mr. Hodge having reported himself sick and the medical officer being unable to find anything the matter with him. But the only person on whom this statement reflects, as the case now stands, is the medical officer himself. In his first letter to me on this subject, Mr. Hodge, senior, clearly stated that his son came home to him broken down in spirit and in health, and was for three months subsequently under medical treatment. Had the opportunity been given him, he could have supplied his own testimony as to his son's condition, fortified by that of the medical gentleman who attended his son during these three months. Without making the slightest attempt to obtain this evidence, but rather having adopted a course which ensures its being kept out of sight, the War Office pronounce this unfortunate officer guilty of malingering, and declare the man they had themselves appointed a few weeks earlier to have been "constitutionally unfitted" to hold a commission. The truth plainly is that if Lord Wolseley had investigated the facts of this case, as he pretends to have done, the question for him to consider would have been how it was that under these circumstances the medical officer to whom Mr. Hodge reported himself failed to see the conspicuous consequences of the treatment to which the lad was being subjected. The whole pretence that an "impartial inquiry" has shown Mr. Hodge to have been "constitutionally unfitted" for a cavalry officer is a piece of iniquity differing in kind, but not in degree, from the treatment which the man received while he was in the regiment.

Passing over for a moment the attempt—precisely similar to that made in the Bruce case, and made in utter defiance of the evidence—to get rid of the suggestion that Mr. Hodge's financial inability "to go the pace of the regiment" was a motive for the persecution, let us look next at the monumental passage, wherein the Commander-in-Chief professes to find no excuse for the treatment of Mr. Hodge, and to declare his determination to "put down bullying with a strong hand." Mr. Hodge, we are here told, was bullied; the excuse put forward for bullying him is one which the Commander-in-Chief cannot accept; his lordship is determined to put down bullying, wherever brought to light, with a strong hand; and what is the conclusion? That no further action is considered necessary in the case. Why? Because the regimental authorities have done everything that circumstances require. And what have the regimental authorities done? Censured the officers concerned, we are told, and punished the ringleaders. The censure, I have heard something of, but it is the first mention that has reached me of any "punishment," and what the statement now made means cannot be better indicated than in Mr. Hodge, senior's, own remarks upon it. Mr. Hodge tells us that his son, who remained in the regiment for some weeks after the time of this alleged punishment, never heard of the ringleaders having been punished. Mr. Bruce who did hear references to the Hodge case, never heard of this punishment. The Under-Secretary of State for War, when the matter was under discussion in Parliament, had never heard of it, although, as Mr. Hodge points out, the punishment, if administered, should have been reported by the Colonel. Will anybody believe, in the face of this, that any punishment deserving of the epithet "drastic" was really inflicted? Again, when was this "drastic" punishment administered? Apparently after Mr. Hodge, senior, came to Aldershot and interviewed the Adjutant. Did it do any good to Mr. Hodge? Not a scrap. True, it led to a cessation of the actual physical violence, but this was only succeeded by methods of torture more refined and more effectual, and by these means the desired result was attained of driving the victim to despair and resignation. All this followed immediately upon the precious "punishment" of the ringleaders, and we are not told by the War Office that this continuation of the persecution has been noticed, still less punished, in any way. Does Lord Wolseley seriously mean that the only form of bullying against which he is determined to use his "strong hand" is actual physical violence, and that every means of making a brother officer's life intolerable, short of brute force, is beyond his cognisance? If so, his declaration against bullying is mere trifling with the public.

But the climax of absurdity, I had almost said impudence, is reached when Mr. Bruce-Pryce is solemnly called as a witness to prove that everything the circumstances called for was done by the authorities in Mr. Hodge's case. This is, indeed, a master-stroke. It is perfectly true, of course, that no personal violence was seriously attempted against Mr. Bruce, just as it is true that it was dropped with Mr. Hodge after the horse-trough performance. There is little doubt that it was somehow brought home to the ringleaders in the attacks on Mr. Hodge's person and property that in the horse-trough business they had gone a little too far, and that if anything of that sort was repeated the consequences might be unpleasant for themselves. That much no one has ever questioned. But does that dispose of these two cases? In all seriousness, "the Secretary of State and his military advisers" seem to hold that it does. They appeal to the fact that a repetition of the horse-trough blackguardism was prevented, as proof that the regimental authorities did everything that was necessary; and they ignore everything which drove Mr. Hodge into resignation. When they came to the Bruce case they shut their eyes to the plain fact that notwithstanding everything that had happened in the Hodge case, the offenders formed an insubordinate conspiracy to defeat another War Office appointment. The formal intimation conveyed to Mr. Bruce of the joint determination of his brother officers to "get rid of him as they had got rid of Hodge"—as insolent a defiance of superior authority as ever was perpetrated—is deemed unworthy of notice by the Commander-in-Chief and his colleagues; and they actually point with triumph to the fact that in the Bruce case the organised opposition stopped short of personal violence, as proof of the sagacity and success with which the "strong hand" had asserted itself in the Hodge case. Whatever else the heads of the War Office may be, they are not absolute fools, and such a perverse misconstruction of plain facts as this can only be attributed to a preconceived determination not to see the truth.

The only result is that a scandal which originally only affected certain officers of one particular regiment now involves equally the Secretary of State and his military advisers—first and foremost among them the Commander-in-Chief. In estimating the responsibility of these higher functionaries, the public has to bear in mind two considerations over and above the actual facts of the case. One is that the young officer who assumed the part of ringleader in the conspiracy to eject Mr. Bruce from the 4th Hussars belongs to an influential family, and that all the influence at his back has been used to prevent a reopening of the case, as I can testify from my own experience. The other consideration is that the officer who commanded the regiment at the time of both occurrences is an old personal adherent of the present Commander-in-Chief, and a humble member of the select band conveniently known in Service circles as "the Wolseley ring." That this officer's personal representations in regard to both matters have been accepted as a convenient substitute for the "personal inquiry" into the facts promised to Parliament, it is easy to guess from a perusal of the documents in which the War Office decision is conveyed. To considerations such as these—coupled with that evil tradition of the War Office, in accordance with which no decision once pronounced is ever modified by the light of fuller knowledge, unless in deference to superior force in the shape of a hostile vote, or the prospect of a hostile vote, in the House of Commons—is to be attributed the flagrant denial of justice and the dishonourable trifling with truth witnessed in the last words of the War Office on these two cases. Nor, from the public point of view, is the refusal to do justice the most serious aspect of the matter. Far more disastrous in its consequences must be the demonstration thus afforded of the readiness of the War Office to wink at a form of misconduct peculiarly odious in itself, and destructive of the best traditions of the Service. Lord Wolseley may prate as he pleases about his determination to put down bullying wherever brought to light with a strong hand. But the fact remains that in one of the most cruel and blackguardly cases of bullying that ever have come to light, he allows the offenders to go scot free, and invokes all the arts of the special pleader as an excuse for inaction; while to this it has to be added that, in the face of a proved and officially-admitted conspiracy among the junior officers of a regiment to force two officers in succession into resignation as soon as they were appointed by the War Office—a conspiracy persisted in notwithstanding official warnings—he declines to see any conduct worthy of reprobation, but rather goes out of his way to approve the personal antipathies by which this double conspiracy was prompted. It may be true that the officers implicated were influentially connected, and that the Colonel who, in the eye of the War Office, shares the responsibility for the result is fortunate in possessing the private ear of the Commander-in-Chief. But these are details which are not likely to be taken into account by the average rowdy subaltern. Every junior officer in a fast regiment may be expected to read the result as proof that the War Office will cheerfully accept the unpopularity of an officer with his comrades as a proof of his unfitness for a commission, and a justification of combined efforts to force him into resignation; and every Service bully will find in it a declaration that, short of such extreme measures as destroying a comrade's clothes and dragging him naked through a horse-trough, he is henceforth to have a free hand in dealing with an "unpopular" comrade. That seems to be the moral of the Hodge and Bruce cases as the Commander-in-Chief has left them.

TIPS AND TIPPERS.

The Paris New York Herald, when not engaged in conclusively proving that the Sultan is what Mr. Parnell would have termed a nice, kindly old gentleman, exceptionally fitted to take part at an Armenian tea-party, has been devoting itself of late to the question of hotel tips, and in order to elucidate the matter it has addressed a series of questions to the principal European hotel-keepers, many of whom have sent replies. It would seem that the Americans are strongly against these tips, but that they are more lavish in respect to them than other nationalities. The hotel-keepers a little evade the question of a charge for service in their bills, but they insist that every servant in their employ receives good wages, and they imply that this charge does not cover the wage. They believe that tips are the only way in which good willing service can be ensured, for without them their servants would be remiss. The scale of tips recommended varies. Some suggest that every guest ought to distribute 10 per cent. on the amount of his bill, some 5 per cent. For a family of two residing in a hotel, the proper distribution, according to most of them, is:—Hall porter, 5 francs; head waiter, 5 francs; chambermaid, 4 francs; table d'hôte waiter, 3 francs; boots, 3 francs; waiter bringing breakfast to room, 4 francs. But in some estimates the amount is considerably larger. Evidently, however, the tips of a person or of a family staying one night at an hotel would be proportionately a good deal higher. Say in the instance of a single man that the bill is 30 francs, and that the tips all told are 5 francs, this would be a good deal more than 10 per cent. on the amount of the former. I make it out that a hall-porter receives about half a franc per diem from each guest in an hotel. Let us suppose a hotel with capacity to hold 300 guests, and where the average each day is 200. In this case the hall-porter would get 100 fr. per diem, i.e., 37,500 fr. per annum. In this case it is difficult to believe that the proprietor does not share in the spoil, for obviously this is an excessive salary for a hall-porter. So, too, in regard to the head-waiter.

A country may change its laws, but countries will never alter what has become a universal custom. Therefore, it is a mere waste of time to protest against hotel tips, for they will always be given. The nuisance connected with them is, that no one exactly knows what to give and to whom it should be given, whilst it is troublesome to distribute them between half-a-dozen people. Some persons, too, will be more generous than others, and this also is not likely to be altered.

What I would consequently suggest is that the total amount of the tips should be handed to one particular person, and that this amount should be subsequently distributed upon some settled ratio amongst those who have, or who think that they have, a claim for them. This would save a world of trouble, and would be fair all round. It certainly does seem absurd that service should be charged in the bill, and subsequently paid for separately. I can remember the time when there was no such charge. There was an outcry for the charge being made in lieu of tips. To this the hotel proprietors naturally assented, knowing that the tips would still continue to be given. I never myself look into the items of a hotel bill; and whether the hotel keeper calls what I have to pay "room," or "service," or "lights," it is all the same in the end. But were I an hotel proprietor myself, I should make my charge inclusive, and "room" would include "service" and "lights." We hear a good deal about the appreciation of gold, but, as a matter of fact, hotel charges have gone up a full 30 per cent. since I first knew them. The hotels are, perhaps, better managed than they used to be, but as regards rooms and food there is not much change. In Paris the charge for "room" is about quadrupled. Probably the dearest hotels in Europe are those of Ostend. In both France and Belgium the hotels are about 20 per cent. dearer than in Germany and in Italy. In Switzerland, and notably in the hotels round about the Lake of Geneva, they are somewhat below the average European price, and there, except during the season, boarders are taken at an exceptionally low charge.

HAWTREY WITH AN ALIAS.

It seems that there is no particular lesson or moral to be deduced from "Mr. Martin," the new play produced last Saturday at the Comedy Theatre, and written by that extremely clever and unique actor-manager, Mr. Charles Hawtrey. Seriously considered, and from an artistic standpoint, it is not what you might call a brilliant triumph; but then nobody does think seriously nowadays, or if they do they are considered ridiculous, so doubtless "Mr. Martin" will be accepted for what it is worth. In this frivolous frame of mind let us see how he impresses the fribble. To begin with, Charles Hawtrey is Mr. Martin, or Martin Heathcote, or Turncote, or any other coat; in fact, anybody but Charles Hawtrey. He is not even a "sublime liar" this time, but a sort of American Anglicised cockney in a very dis-United State. Now, Martin-Hawtrey is introduced to us at a pal's rooms, where his host, one Lovell, is in the act of giving a supper to his fiancée, Maudie Vavasour Venne, from the "'alls," and a few other sister artistes with and without husbands. Their conversation is curious, and their manners somewhat low; but this sort of thing in these days appertains to high-class comedy. Lovell confides to the attentive Hawtrey that he is engaged to the fair Lottie; his parents know of his engagement, but hold! They do not know she is from the music-halls, and what do you think the naughty boy has told them? Why, that Maudie is a good little governess. At this juncture in comes Lottie from the supper-room to say she has to be off to do "a turn" somewhere—she doesn't say where—but will be back anon, and she skips away, having first given the audience several verses of her song, which, as she says, is "so old it may be new to some of them." It is, in fact, "The Young Man from the Country," which dates from Evans's about the year 1858. Then in comes a real American this time—none of your penny-plain-and-tuppence-coloured business, but a good sound American, with no nonsense about him, and an accent you could bang nails into. Well, this Yankee Brookfield is a desperate villain, a card sharper, and a low swindler, who brags that he can beat any one at the game of bluff, and is a past master at "Blind Hookey." The whole party, minus the hard-working Lottie, sit down to play a quiet little round of cards, and then the band begins to play. Brookfield fleeces the lot of everything, and his sly description of the "'cute little game" called "Blind Hookey" is intensely humorous. Just as Lovell has been rooked and ruined, back comes the fair Lottie from the variety show. She enters softly, nobody sees her, and she catches sight of the wily American, and, with a stifled cry of "My husband! My husband! Not dead, but all alive, oh!" down comes the curtain.

We are next taken on a visit to Lovell's papa and mamma, who own a heavily-mortgaged family estate, and a small, priggish young niece, who is also very rude, and wants a good slapping to bring her to her senses. Hawtrey, meanwhile, has promised to see Papa Kemble about Lovell's debts, and beg for a little on account. He arrives, and is taken for the American, who is also expected, as papa wishes to raise a bit on "his own," and the American has dangled before his greedy old eyes some wonderful bubble mine which is to pay a million per cent. dividend before any shares are even issued. The first cheque is handed over to the Cockney Martin, therefore, without a murmur, and is immediately posted to his friend Lovell. Then by some mysterious piece of luck Maudie Vavasour's Aunt Rose Leclercq is discovered on the premises, and then, strange to relate, down comes Maudie to confide the awful news to her convenient relative that her husband is resurrected. Aunt Leclercq, a woman of good sound morals and common sense, urges entire secrecy about the affair as regards Lovell, to whom she is betrothed, and does not wince at the suggestion of bigamy. Lottie strongly objects to the idea of "doing time," and is delighted at the appearance of Hawtrey, who tells her of the cheque and the mistaken identity. Lottie says, "We are lost; the American may be here at any moment; it must be kept dark at all cost. Leave it to me. I will meet the bubble gentleman. He shall not resist my wheedling ways." Then papa and mamma come in and welcome Lottie, who has only popped in to consult Auntie for a moment, but has brought her luggage with her—she is evidently a quick-change artist—which is immediately sent for, and in a few minutes Lottie comes in dressed in her best black gown prepared for conquest and to waylay the American Brookfield, whose foot, or rather feet, are already on the stairs. What, Lottie! What, Charlie! But notwithstanding the relationship existing between them, Lottie tells her husband he must be Hawtrey for twenty-four hours; that is to say, until Lovell has received and cashed his father's cheque. Brookfield indignantly refuses. He says, "I am a man of honour." In fact, the patent swindler never could, and never will be, other than himself. Then Lottie whispers in his ear, "You must, or I'll denounce you!" "Do your worst," says the heartless Brookfield. "I defy you." "Auntie is in the next room," says Lottie. "Oh, is auntie here?" says Brookfield. "Why didn't you say that first? That puts an entirely new complexion on to the affair. You may rely on your request receiving the strictest attention," and off he goes to dress for dinner, leaving Lottie right centre of the stage and entire mistress of the situation. The unexpected arrival of young Lovell in the last act blows the whole concern, for of course when he enters he greets his pal as Martin Hawtrey, whereat papa demands an explanation, and is very angry indeed, and invites Lovell and Hawtrey to have it out in his sanctum sanctorum. The trio return, evidently refreshed by papa's frothy conversation, and Lovell, finding his fiancée is a very much married lady, seeks consolation from the priggish niece; and as there is nothing more to be done, most of the company retire to play a game of sixty up, and leave Lottie and Hawtrey to finish the play as best they can, which is real mean, as they might have seen it out to the finish.

Why Mr. Charles Hawtrey has suddenly wearied of himself and tried to sink his individuality under an assumed one is probably best known to himself, but I certainly prefer him as nature intended him to be; but possibly there are some of a different opinion. Miss Lottie Venne is clever in everything she does, but it is open to doubt if the pathetic stop quite belongs to her style; in the comic scenes she was charming. Miss Nina Boucicault made the most of a very small part, and everyone was sorry that there was not more for her to do. Mr. Charles Brookfield was admirable as the swindling American, and Mr. W. Lovell, Mr. William Hawtrey, and Miss Rose Leclercq all worked hard to make bricks with very little straw.

"Mr. Martin" is a clever piece of work, the dialogue is bright, and if there is not much plot to set you thinking, perhaps this is a fault on the right side. Nowadays people want to be amused and not sent home racking their brains to know the why or wherefore of some astounding social problem.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

POTEMKIN IN PARIS.

It was Potemkin-like of M. Jambon, the theatrical decorator, to cover the trees in the Champs Elysées with spring bloom in honour of the Imperial visitors. Jambon wanted the French capital to be "Paris-symbole." It was to give a message of joyous greeting. How better do so than with spring blossoms? October is supposed to say to Czar and Czarina, "You are welcome as the flowers of May, and here we are in bloom to make you feel so." The first impression is startling, but not unpleasant. If the Imperial guests remained a whole week, they would get tired of it, as we all get sick of an oft-seen article de fantaisie. And is not extravaganza in keeping with the Franco-Russian alliance? The wedding of the carp and rabbit was not more improbable. We should as soon have thought four or five years ago of fruit-trees blooming in October as of a dresser of skins receiving the Czar and Czarina in the name of France and in the palace of Louis XIV.

Since M. Jambon was about imitating Potemkin, he might as well have arranged to clear off the flowers on the last day of the Czar's visit, and replace them with cellulose fruits. This would have been a way of saying, "Time speeds so fast when we bask in the light of your countenance that a whole spring and summer seem to us but a few days." The fruits, with electric light glowing through them, would have been in keeping with the russet and golden hues of the foliage.

M. Jambon's wand has produced not only a tree covered with white blossoms in October, but it has also called forth flax-blue blossoms. Blue is a common colour in the wild and garden flora, but I cannot think of any tree that affects it. But why, since we admit the action of the wand, carp at this other wonder? The decorator wanted to pay a compliment to the Russian taste for crude colours in his Boulevard decorations. From the entrance of the Rue Royale to the Bastille there is a succession of lintels of a Russo-Japanese structure. They span the Boulevards. Their horizontal beams are adorned with a row of globes of a dull-gold hue. Other globes of sage-green and amaranth-red are arranged in three and four-leaved shamrocks and other patterns above the lintels. Festoons of others, all brightly coloured, and holding electric lamps, complete the adornment. The material on which the decorator worked is not glass, but cellulose. It looks dull in the day time, but lights up well. Fancy what a perspective burst on the eyes of the Imperial guests as they drove to the Opera House! They had first seen from a looking-glass pavilion at the Trocadéro a pyrotechnic Niagara. The great American waterfall is below the level of the shores between which it falls. Its fiery and artificial prototype was as high above as the top of the Eiffel Tower. Statistics de-poetise. Why, then, say that the fire cascade had at the top a diameter in every direction of 40 mètres; that 15,000 double-detonating fuses shot skyward as the cascade descended; that 2,000 tricoloured "bombs" crashed; that a gigantic St. Nicholas, looking like moonshine, arose on the second platform of the tower, and that the booming of 1,000 heavy fort guns announced the presence of the Czar and Czarina? Otherwise prodigious were the fever, racket, impulsive folly, and human pressure in the elbowing, rushing, roaring crowd that wanted to catch a glimpse of the frail, nervous-looking Czar and the Czarina.

Protocolatry is now the state religion. It possesses the official world and has spread to the country. The other day a sub-Prefect who was giving a dinner-party nearly found himself without guests just as the dinner was about to be announced. He had invited the county councillors of his arrondissement, a general making a tour of inspection, and the head doctor of a hospital. When they had all met in the salon a Radical journalist who was also bidden entered. A Protocolater belonging to the county council went round asking his colleagues whether they would not retire. He put to them that they, as representatives of the people, had in a degree sovereign rank, because they were entitled to know beforehand what other persons the Prefect wished to ask. This view was shared by some. But the other councillors thought it would be better to ask their host to step aside and request him either to choose between them and the journalist. This was done. The sub-Prefect stood by his Radical guest. But being a clever man, he said, "I propose a course that will save the dignity of every one. You will find in the next room pens, ink, and paper. Draw up and sign a protest, which I promise to forward on to my chief. This will let off ill-humour and enable us to dine with a good appetite. Apropos, the dinner has been prepared by one of Chevet's best artists. The Radical is a good fellow, a Parisian, and quite a wit. He is likely to climb high, and I fancy is a man to court." The Protocolists consented, and the dinner passed off pleasantly.

The Czar's action has been rather to keep down than to foment Protocolatry. He is so high that he really can hardly attach importance to those molehills that seem mountainic at the Quai d'Orsay. It was his idea to bring the Parliament forward. Of course he does not come to France to express his admiration for the chic of this elderly climber, the historical talents of another, or the diplomatic zeal of a third. What he wants is to be in touch with the nation. Parties come and go, Presidents are broken like toys that have ceased to please, statesmen idolised yesterday may be pilloried to-morrow. But Marianne is always the brisk, courageous, hard-working, money-saving Gauloise who pulled France through twenty-six years ago.

The pictorial side of the Imperial visit may be spoken of as la Russie à toutes les sauces. The chromo-lithographers were divided about the colour of the Czarina's eyes. Some made them brown, some blue. The fair hair and beard of the Czar were a surprise. In his photos they came out black. We had him and her driving, walking, standing, sitting, and with the baby. They were given as they appeared at Moscow, Vienna, Breslau, and Copenhagen, where they were done with the other posterity of the King and Queen of Denmark. Their heads were served up in medallion engravings on menus; their likenesses were the culmination of a long line of dynastic portraits. By the way, why is it that the Catherines and Anne and Elizabeth were so full-bodied and jolly-looking, and the five last Empresses so very different? The widow of Paul I. looks, though stout, gnawed with discontent. Charlotte of Prussia (the first Alexandra) is, in her engraved portraits, only skin and bone. The wife of Alexander II. seems deeply melancholy, and has the sunken chest of a consumptive. The Dowager Empress's mouth shows material well-being, but the rest of the face shows nervousness and anxiety. Her figure remains neat and slender. The present Empress, it is remarked, looks in fragile health. She inspires great interest, and has a beautiful profile, to which the fullest justice is done by M. Chaplain, of the Mint, the author of the Nicholas-Alexandra medallion.

Last week the papers had, through an official telegraphic agency, a daily record of all the President's doings. We were told whom he had to lunch or dinner, what rides he took, what audiences he gave. Were there slopes at Rambouillet (a ci-devant Royal Castle where Francis I. died) we should doubtless have been informed how M. Félix Faure walked on them.

The cruel chaffing about things sartorial has brought back M. Faure to l'habit noir, or black swallow-tail. He wore it at Cherbourg, and wherever else he had to appear with the Czar. We are curious to hear what he will wear on horseback at Chalons. The Frenchman marries, buries, and feasts in the black swallow-tail. It is the evening dress of master and man, the symbol of equality, respectability, and monotony. L'habit noir is a fruit of the revolution that has conquered the world. One finds it in the dress-circle of theatres from Stockholm to the Antipodes. Wherever there is a modern hotel one sees it on the waiter's back. When a Turkish Pasha gives a dinner he expects his guests to come in the black swallow-tail and white cravat. The uppish French craftsman, who longs to figure as a bourgeois, wears the habit noir on his Sunday outings. M. Faure overrated his influence when he thought he was able to fling aside this sartorial despot.

The Marquis de Noailles, Ambassador to the Court of Berlin, a few days ago left the Castle, where he had been staying as a guest. He went thence on a visit to his nephew, the Duc de Noailles, at Maintenon. That seat of Louis XIV.'s elderly companion is not far from Rambouillet. The young Duchesse de Noailles is a sister of the Duc de Luynes, the Duc d'Orléans' devoted friend. The young Duchesse de Luynes is a daughter of the Duchesse d'Uzès, the great confederate of General Boulanger. This lady has been invited to join at the Opera House the Presidential and Imperial party in the State box. She will have some Royalist officers in attendance on the Czar and the Duc d'Aumale to sympathise with. The Duchess lent General Boulanger £120,000 on the Comte de Paris' bond. He promised to pay "when Monarchy was restored." After his death she appealed to his heirs for payment. But no single heir was rich enough to part with money. The Duc d'Orléans was willing to renew his father's promise to pay, with the same stipulation. One of the odd features of the Franco-Russian extravaganza is the Duchesse d'Uzès' figuring in the State box. Major MacMahon, Duc de Magenta, who acts as aide-de-camp to the Czar for the Chalons Review, is regarded by his Imperial Majesty as a connection. His wife, the Princess Marguerite de Chartres, is sister of the Czar's aunt-in-law, the Princess Waldemar of Denmark.

I had this from an American lady, who asked the Angel Gabriel to give her some insight into the Emperor William's thoughts. Said the Angel, who, like Satan, can quote Scripture:—"In the beginning was the word, and the word was with William, and the word was William." There was a long pause. "Anything more?' inquired the lady. "What more could there be?" replied the Angel.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE following distressing letter, dear Lady Betty, has been addressed to me by an eminent and friendly foreigner:—

"Sir,—I know many English men and women, and I like them very much. Nevertheless, I am aware that your fellow-country men and women are generally detested upon the Continent. This you have at last perceived, and you are unable to account for it.

"There is in your nation a distinct tribe consisting of several thousands of men and women who appear to have no settled homes, but ramble from hotel to hotel upon the Continent. These people, who are generally either tall and thin, or short and stout, carry with them insular prejudices which they have glorified into principles. They imagine that every foreigner is immoral, and that all foreigners are dirty; they regard all continental gaiety as being either undue frivolity or absolute unrighteousness. In fact, in the eyes of these aggressively superior persons all we foreigners are cigarette-smoking, soap-hating, scheming, unscrupulous, effeminate, sinful people; and they take considerable trouble to make us perceive that these are the opinions which they have of us.

"We may possibly be all this, but it is not unreasonable that we do not like being told so. Yet thousands, I might say hundreds of thousands, of your country men and women over-run the Continent, and by their every act continuously impress upon us that we are entirely composed of cigarette-smoke and sinfulness, whilst they are all beef, beer, Bible, and bull-dog. These people, moreover, are sour-tempered, unattractive-looking, ill-dressed, awkward-mannered persons who, by their appearance, aggravate the irritation which their mental attitude towards us creates. They dress as they never would dream of dressing in their own country. They wear large-checked suits, Tam o' Shanter caps, knickerbockers, and Heaven knows what other sartorial abominations! They walk in the middle of the roads—disdaining the common pavements; they disregard the customs of the various countries they visit, and even consider that they are above complying with the ordinary regulations of the local authorities. If taken to task for some offence against these, they threaten to direct the thunderbolts of Truth and the Times upon the officials.

"This, however, is not all. Even the best class of English men and women are habitually, though no doubt unconsciously, offensive. A British Peer or Peeress will almost invariably insist upon having a carriage reserved for his or her exclusive use when travelling upon the Continent. Many foreign magnates travel in England, but seldom do any of these refuse to mix with other first-class passengers. Some time ago a British Peer—a Baron—was travelling to Constantinople. It need scarcely be added that he had a special train for the purpose. Before he arrived at one of the capitals through which he had to pass a telegram was received ordering a special luncheon to be prepared for his lordship and his party. The public refreshment-room was at once closed for the occasion, and about twenty waiters were engaged at a moment's notice, each being provided with a new pair of white gloves! This particular Peer was not a great Duke, but merely a newly-created Baron! Our noblemen do not expect to be treated with this almost regal magnificence, nor, indeed, do yours when they are travelling in their own country.

"Please remember that there is scarcely a single foreigner between the two poles who has not at some time or other had his temper ruffled by the aggressively superior conduct of one of your country men or women. For the sake of the popularity, and even of the prosperity, of your nation, I would advise that a special Government Department should be founded to control your people when upon their travels, seeing that by their appearance, their manners, and their prejudices, they continually do so much to make the English detested.

"Diplomat."

A curious incident relating to the Venezuelan crisis has leaked out, and has caused much amusement. It will be remembered that when the crisis was most acute the American Government could not comprehend why no answer to their last despatch was received from Lord Salisbury. It appears now that the despatch drafted by Lord Salisbury was by some error placed in the Foreign Office bag addressed to China, and this in due course was delivered to our Minister at Pekin. When the responsible authorities at the Foreign Office heard what had happened, they were naturally dismayed, and the difficulty which first presented itself to their minds was how to make known to Lord Salisbury the awkward error which had occurred. However, it was useless to discuss the matter, so the person whose duty it was to speak to Lord Salisbury upon the subject lost no time before doing so. The best part of the story remains to be told. It is declared that when Lord Salisbury learnt what had occurred he burst out laughing and exclaimed, "I knew I should get into trouble over this Venezuelan affair!"

Time is the best diplomatist.

The story is given as it is told, but, of course, it is impossible to guarantee that it is true. It would be too good a joke if the Foreign Office authorities really did forward to Pekin a most important despatch intended for Washington.

The future of Boodle's Club must soon be decided upon. There are many who hope that the premises may be acquired by the Royal Yacht Squadron, in which case the club-house would become the London home of the members of the Squadron. Until now the members of the Royal Yacht Squadron have had no London house of their own, though their committee meetings have always been held at Boodle's. If the committee of the Squadron decide to establish an annex in London to their club at Cowes, the former will certainly be one of the most exclusive clubs in the West End.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

THE grievous collapse of Knight of the Thistle was the great event of last week. Newmarket people were perfectly infatuated about the horse, and good judges vowed that Persimmon could have no chance with him at the weights. Knight of the Thistle had been going finely in his gallops, and he had done well in a rough trial over the Cambridgeshire course, but in the race for the Jockey Club Stakes he made no show whatever. He has grown into a very handsome horse, and he is still capable of improvement, but if he showed his correct form on Thursday last, he cannot have a 1,000 to 1 chance for the Cambridgeshire. Sir Visto (who will also be benefited by a few more sharp gallops) gave Knight of the Thistle 26 lb. and an easy beating in the Jockey Club Stakes, but in the Cambridgeshire they will meet at 22 lb. It seems to me that Sir Visto has been rushed to a false price for the Cambridgeshire, as Persimmon literally won all the way on Thursday, and it is impossible to estimate the amount of weight the Prince of Wales's colt had in hand. The fact is that when a race is won in this hollow fashion it is all nonsense and rubbish to depend upon the placings of the beaten lot. It is as well that Persimmon is not likely to run again before Ascot, for some of his admirers are falling into a state of dangerous ecstasy on the subject of his merits; but then a number of enthusiasts are thrown regularly every season into frantic paroxysms of praise by the achievements of the horse of the year. It may be hoped that next season we shall see the Ascot Cup contested by Persimmon, Champaubert, and Velasquez, supposing that Lord Rosebery's colt trains on all right and wins the Derby.

The Kingsclere people appear to be floundering about without rudder or compass. Brooch had been so well tried that she was made a great favourite for the Buckenham Stakes, but never for a moment did she look like winning, and she certainly is not the stamp of animal to show to advantage in heavy ground. Blue Water must have gone off considerably during the autumn, or else she must have been giving Brooch an enormous amount of weight in the trial which this filly won. Then the Great Foal Stakes was nearly lost through the muddling pace, as Labrador, instead of coming along as best he could, was waited with, the result being that he was within an ace of being defeated by Serfdom. They really raced for only about three hundred yards. When a good stayer is running against animals which are comparatively deficient in stamina he ought most assuredly to force the pace, instead of puddling about, as did Labrador, the issue of such senseless tactics usually being that the good thing is beaten at the finish for speed. The capital blunder last week in the management of the Duke of Westminster's horses, which was patent to every rational spectator, was the selection of Regret to run for the Jockey Club Stakes in preference to Labrador. At Newmarket, in July, Persimmon gave 12 lb. and a beating to Regret, who was now meeting the Prince of Wales's horse at 6 lb., so he could have no chance unless he had made a prodigious improvement. It was alleged that Regret is now a different horse and decidedly superior to Labrador, but the irresistible logic of facts proves that this theory was all vapour and moonshine. Regret was never in it with Persimmon at 6 lb., whereas at Doncaster Labrador, running at even weights, made the Prince's colt fairly gallop. On the Leger running it is obvious that last week's race must have been a close thing between Persimmon and Labrador, and although the Prince's colt would doubtless have won, yet the Duke of Westminster's colours would have been carried more creditably than they were by Regret. The Kingsclere people have always been quite entêté on the subject of Regret, but surely it must now be recognised, even by his quand-même worshippers, that he cannot stay, and that even over his own distance (an easy mile at the outside) he is by no means an animal of superlative merit.

Hellebore won the Hopeful Stakes very cleverly from Berzak, as I had predicted would be the case. Lord Durham's colt bids fair to make a grand three-year-old, and it is greatly to be regretted that, by some inconceivable blundering, he should have been withdrawn from the Derby when the minor forfeit was declared, as also was Fiorini. Hellebore also paid forfeit for the £2,000 stake at Liverpool next July. Lord Durham has luckily left his colt in the Eclipse Stakes, and he is in the rich St. James's Palace Stakes at Ascot, the entry for which race does not include Velasquez.

Lord Durham had a great favourite for the Triennial in Not Much, a colt about whose excellence Newmarket people has been very eloquent, and so generously and extensively was he supported that odds were betted on him in a field of six. The winner, however, turned up in Santa Stella, who was not backed for sixpence. The filly is by St. Simon out of Star of Fortune, and Lord Derby gave 2,000 gs. for her at Newmarket last December.

It was announced in TRUTH shortly after Goodwood that Goletta would miss her Doncaster engagement (the Champagne Stakes) and be reserved for the Rous Memorial last Friday, which race she "just" won, after a desperate finish with Eager. Although odds were freely betted on the filly it was the general opinion of the Newmarket experts that the colt would win. I was also right in predicting the success of Berzak in the Rutland Stakes, and Stewarton had no chance with the American colt.

The Cambridgeshire will evidently be a very heavy betting race, and wise people will leave it alone until after the Cesarewitch. Thais is being zealously written up, but she certainly will not beat Canterbury Pilgrim at the weights, to which it may be added that the Prince's filly will probably fail to quite stay the course. Marco has been heavily backed, but there was literally nothing in his Triennial victory, as Dingle Bay, who is a slow beast, had to make his own running, so that Mr. Luscombe's horse was allowed to wait comfortably, and then beat the Ebor winner for speed. I cannot conceive why Marco was not sent to Paris to run for the Prix du Conseil Municipal, as he would have met the best horses with a great advantage in the weights. I do not anticipate Marco's victory in the Cambridgeshire, and, although he did win very easily last year, yet it must be remembered that there was not nearly so good a field as there will be on the 28th. The Irish are reported to have a real good thing in Winkfield's Pride, and after Bellevin's runaway victory at Manchester (when he was handicapped with ridiculous and reprehensible leniency) they ought to make no mistake. If Winkfield's Pride really means Bellevin at 6 st. 10 lb. he will be hard to beat. Shaddock, whose name does not figure in the betting, will as nearly as possible win the Cambridgeshire if he goes on all right.

I am not going to attempt a definite prediction for the Cesarewitch, writing ten days before the race is run. I do not fancy Chit Chat, who has been first favourite since her owner's very foolish letter was published. If this horse is, after all, ridden by Robinson and wins, then there will be vituperative cries from all quarters from infuriated backers who will profess to have been "stalled off" by Mr. Calvert's epistle. Un père de famille est capable de tout, said Talleyrand, and one may say the same of a "professional" owner of race horses. Mr. Calvert, of course, does not belong to this category, and no doubt he acted in accordance with bad advice in writing the letter which has been so severely criticised. In future he will do well not to concern himself about the operations of the public backers, who will not thank him if the horse loses, and who will overwhelm him with invectives if it wins. Laodamia is not doing an orthodox Cesarewitch preparation, but the mare does not require much work. There is no getting away from her Doncaster form, although people at Newmarket said that The Rush will beat her next week, as the Cup was a false run race. If it is true that Mr. Fulton requires a bet of 30,000 to 2,000 about Laodamia, the sooner she is scratched the better, for he might as well ask for the moon. I heard, however, a fortnight ago, from good authority, that he has £1,000 on the mare. Count

Schomberg seems to me to be decidedly overweighted. St. Bris is firm in the market, and he is much fancied by clever people, while, with Labrador in the stable, Porter should be able to estimate this horse's chance to an ounce. Portmarnock made many friends at Newmarket last week, and he gallops like a stayer. This horse certainly ought to run well. Of the Lordship Farm lot, I expect Corsican will prove the best, and shall not be surprised if this horse finishes in the first three if he comes to the post fit and well. Cypria is undergoing a thorough preparation of the old-fashioned sort, and she is one of the select band of starters that is at least sure to stay the course. Three years ago the mare ran a dead-heat for the Cesarewitch with Red Eyes, having 6 st. 5 lb. on her back, and now she has only 7 st. to carry. Nouveau Riche has been backed down to 100 to 8, but for this horse I have no fancy whatever, while his stable companion, Oleander, is not likely to start. Bournemouth has fallen lame, and he will not run. The Rush fairly walked away from Phœbus Apollo the other day in a smart gallop over the Cesarewitch distance, and there is no doubt but that Mr. Dobell's horse will beat many more than will beat him. Victor Wild will run well if he starts. It is said that Arlequin always runs best now on hard ground, in which case he is not likely to be suited by the Newmarket going next week; but, considering the fashion in which this horse has been backed, his supporters do not appear to have any qualms in connection with the state of the course. It is unlikely that there will be much more heavy betting on the Cesarewitch until after the race for the Duke of York Handicap on Saturday, and probably before the flag falls the market on this event will have been thoroughly revolutionised.

When the final forfeit was declared for the Imperial Produce Stakes at Kempton Park sixty-five two-year-olds were left in, but there is likely to be only a small field on Friday, although it is a case of paying £31 on each entry, run or not. Velasquez will not start, being in reserve for the Middle Park Plate, and Lord Rosebery will be represented by Chelandry, who went uncommonly well in her gallops last week, and she seems to be in excellent form just now. Lowly will not run again this season, and Vesuvian (who was expected to represent the Kingsclere stable in the race) is still backward. Cyrenian won the Granby Plate at Newmarket last week for Lord Londonderry; but he is not likely to beat Chelandry, running at weight for sex. Rapallo, the brother of Laveno, does not seem to be anything of a flyer, and I have heard nothing favourable of Brilliana (half-sister to Ayrshire and Troon, by Sheen), who is to carry the Duke of Portland's colours. I shall plump for Chelandry.

There will be a good field for the Duke of York Handicap on Saturday, and the race has really lost nothing by having the value reduced to £2,000 from £5,000. Last year this event cost the fund £3,100. Quarrel will run, and the course will suit him exactly, but I fancy that Lord Rosebery's horse must be now getting rather stale after all the work he has done this year. Marco, Shaddock, and Canterbury Pilgrim will not run, as they are all in reserve for the Cambridgeshire. Kirkconnel is very well in on his best form, but he cannot be trusted. Bellevin might as well run, even with his penalty, unless his party start Winkfield's Pride. Red Heart, who was the pick of this handicap, has been doing very little work, and the French mare Ghislaine, who was also thrown in, has been seriously amiss. The Tup ought to beat Quarrel on the Royal Hunt Cup running. Hebron ought to run well. Teufel is fancied, and it was over this course that he defeated St. Frusquin last year when in receipt of 10 lb., but the Rothschild colt ought to have won that race. I do not think it worth while to pay attention to the recent form of Teufel, having received a hint that he would improve vastly on these exhibitions in the course of the autumn. The Lombard will probably represent the Bedford Cottage stable, as Amphora cannot stay the course. His Reverence may run for the Duke of Portland, and La Sagesse is said to be a certain starter, but there was nothing brilliant in her Newmarket running last week. Lord Hervey was galloped on Friday and did well enough, but he is decidedly over-weighted. King Hampton is a tip for every short distance handicap that is run, and his day may have at last arrived, but he might give way to Red Heart, who would win in a canter if he was properly trained. Mr. Rucker's horse, however, cannot be fit, so one is obliged to put him aside, and I fancy that either Birch Rod or Rampion will be the winner. Lord Stanley's filly will show to advantage in the deep ground, for she is a powerful animal. The distance will just suit Rampion, who is now in good form.

There will be capital racing at Newmarket next week, and large entries have been obtained for the Nurseries and other handicaps, but the fields for most of the weight-for-age stakes are likely to be small.

There are thirty-six entries for the Clearwell Stakes on Tuesday, including Goletta, Filliford, Berzak, Berriedale, and the colt by Hampton out of Countess Lilian. I shall plump for Mr. de Rothschild's filly. The Bretby Post Stakes of £500 on Thursday may be left to the Duke of Westminster's candidate. There are twenty-five entries for the Prendergast Stakes, including Minstrel, Fiorini, Smean, Brigg, and Arc-en-Ciel. Lord Durham's colt ought to win this race if he is all right. There are 107 nominations for the Middle Park Plate, so that instead of the Jockey Club adding £500, there is a surplus of £35 from the entrances. The entry includes Wreath Or, Minstrel, Galtee More, Rapallo, Monterey, Cyrenian, Berzak, Smean, Brilliana, Velasquez, Chelandry, Goletta, and Filliford. It was expected that the Duke of Westminster would have a dangerous candidate for this race in either Orelio (brother to Ormonde) or Guernsey (by Bend Or out of Jersey Lily), but I hear that both colts want time, and it is exceedingly doubtful whether either of them will run this season. It would in any case be a wiser policy to reserve the most forward of the pair for the Dewhurst Plate, as Velasquez is not engaged in that race, and the selected one would have 7 lb. the best of the weights with Goletta. Mr. James is believed to have a smart filly in Catherine Luther (by St. Simon out of Heresy, by Hermit), who cost 3,800 gs. at Doncaster last year. Mr. M. Dawson's Sir Sydney (by Ayrshire out of Voisine) had a great private reputation at one time, but I have heard nothing of him lately. My own opinion is that Velasquez will win as easily as did St. Frusquin last year.

The Royal Post Stakes entry includes Safety Pin, Santa Maura, South Australian, Aureus, Regret, and Conroy, and the Duke of Westminster's candidate ought to win. This will probably be Conroy, who can easily beat Safety Pin. Lord Derby has four entries for the Newmarket Oaks, but Canterbury Pilgrim is not one of them. The list includes Drip, Burgonet, Miss Frazer, Snowy Corrie, Roquebrune, La Toison d'Or, Helm, and Jolly Boat. This race should fall to Helm, who has to give 5 lb. to Roquebrune. There are sixty-eight nominations for the Champion Stakes, and as there is an entrance of £15, the £1,000 which is nominally added all comes out of the pockets of the subscribers. The conditions (as in so many similar events at Newmarket) are in the greatest degree idiotic. This is a sweepstake of £50 each for starters only, but how much more attractive the race would be if it was made a sweepstakes of £50 each for every horse left in after the first Tuesday in the January before running. The entry includes Marco, Knight of the Thistle, Sir Visto, Roquebrune, Tokio II. (the Hungarian horse who was so heavily backed for last year's Cambridgeshire and who won the Baden Grand Prize a few weeks ago), Conroy, Labrador, and Rampion. There are neither penalties nor allowances in the race, and I shall predict the success of Sir Visto. Persimmon will not run for the Lowther Stakes (another event with most calf-headed conditions), the entry for which includes Avilion, Utica, Shaddock, Rampion, The Quack, Butterfly, Bay Ronald, and Earwig. It is quite possible that Bay Ronald may win this race, as he has a considerable advantage in the weights.

The Amateur Athletic Association is no doubt thoroughly pleased with itself and at the same time overjoyed at the thought that it has dumbfounded those who have criticised adversely its conduct in not punishing the clubs who paid the new-fledged professional runners. One man was punished, Mr. Cook, the Association's officer for Essex. He paid Blair £3. Blair was pardoned, being young, and now Mr. Cook has been reinstated as officer, after apologising for his wicked ways and admitting the justice of his sentence. He had acted inadvertently. Perhaps the money had been received in the same spirit. In the meantime no official mention is made of a single club that has paid the unpardoned athletes. The A.A.A. and its officials are only stultifying themselves by their action. But perhaps this is too wide a condemnation. It is very judicious of the guilty clubs to let the innocent ones suffer with them. It is so sportsmanlike.

There is quite a crisis in cross-country running. The Southern Association has practically decided to have nothing to do with the National Championships unless the venue is in their district, owing to the discomfort and mismanagement that the competitors have to undergo when they are catered for by the North and Midlands. The majority of the runners come from the South, and while in some respects it would be a pity if the National Championships were abolished, it is scarcely a matter for astonishment that the South should act in the way that it has done. If each division were to hold its meeting, and then teams selected from the North, South, and Midlands were to compete for the championship, this would serve the purposes of a national meeting. It would be more easily managed, but then there would be no club champion as there is at present.

The big gates that have been drawn by Bacon in his recent matches with Anstead and Conneff show that people are genuinely interested in foot racing if they can get good sport for their money and a little betting thrown in. It is the provisions against betting that make the attendances at amateur meetings so small. At the same time the average "bookie" who intrudes is probably better outside than inside the enclosure. It is curious to note the extent to which different sports vary. Betting is rigorously suppressed by the Amateur Athletic Association. The Amateur Rowing Association holds its head high and scorns the morality of the cinder path, and yet over the University boat race there is always any amount of betting, and there is hardly an official of the Association who has not something on. In professional running this bar on betting does not exist. There is no reason why professional athletics should not be held in better esteem than at present. A decent programme with moderate stakes would probably attract people. But, unfortunately, the sport seems doomed to disappointment. Bacon met Conneff in a three-mile race. After a third of the distance had been travelled Conneff retired and Bacon strolled home in a time that the average University three-miler could have beaten with ease.

The visit of the Metropolitan Rugby clubs to the West last Saturday was not very successful. Blackheath were beaten by Bristol, and the Old Merchant Taylors by Newport. The latter result was not unexpected, but that the former should have succumbed is remarkable. The Heathens had to rely on an old-fashioned lot of forwards who, apparently, have not learned or else have forgotten the game. For it was forward that the westerners shone. It was interesting to see how Newport would get on without Gould, the inventor of the four three-quarter system. His absence will not make the difference to the game that many have anticipated. The clockwork-like game will be continued, but the players will be more liable to become demoralised when anything goes wrong now that Gould is absent. For he had learned to play under the old system, and therefore he was not wanting in individual play and resource when the occasion required. The London Scottish had not much to fear from the Nomads. But Campbell cannot often play, and Gowans and Gedge are only available in vacation, so that their outsides will be weak and their forwards will apparently show little improvement on last year. At present it looks as though the Harlequins and Richmond would be near the top of the tree. At all events honours are pretty certain to go to one of the leading clubs who, with fair outsides, play the old forward game. They must shove and be quick in dribbling, and able to pass amongst themselves. A pack of eight men coming along with the ball does far more damage than one man who receives the ball from a long pass can possibly hope to do. There is no need for Mr. Budd to press his idea that "kicking out" from a scrimmage should practically be declared to be illegal. A club that does not play this game, but teaches its forwards to carry the ball along with them, is bound to succeed. This play has been the secret of the success of Ireland and Scotland in International games, and it is to be hoped some Metropolitan clubs will profit by the lessons gleaned from these matches.

The Football Association, in its zeal for amateurism, has vetoed the organising and touring of scratch teams, and it is said that certain prominent amateurs are to come under its ban. How far this is aimed at the Corinthians it is not for me to say. But there is no doubt that the professional party in Association football literally hates the unpaid gentleman player, and will do everything it can to bring him into ridicule, hatred, and contempt. If, however, the Corinthian accounts are kept as carefully as they were a few years ago at the time a reference was made to them in these columns, when Mr. A. J. Hornby attacked the club, there is every reason to believe the attack will miserably fail. No doubt the attack is meant as a counterblast to the London Football Association's refusal to legislate for professionalism.

In the Association matches Sunderland at home went under to the Wolves after a rough game. Liverpool still show excellent form, and it required good play on the part of Everton to win. Storer played excellently in goal. There was a very fast game between Luton and Woolwich Arsenal, and there was very little difference between the play of either team. For Luton, Galbraith played grandly, and the team are to be congratulated on having played a draw. There was a very pleasant game between the Casuals and Ealing, for whom Chater made one or two good runs, but their opponents were too strong for them.

The Crystal Palace Cycling track should soon become popular with record breakers. Of course, Stocks is a brilliant rider, but he must have been helped by the track in beating Linton's records for an hour's ride. In fact, had not the pacing come to grief owing to accidents, he would most likely have done thirty-two miles in the time; as it was he did not far from thirty-one and a half miles. Only a few years back Cortis was the first to do twenty miles in the hour on the old Palace track. This was considered marvellous, but an intelligent policeman would have little difficulty in swearing a road scorcher was going at this pace nowadays. Bardsley was an easy winner in good time of the amateur fifty miles championship. Turning to walking, Sturgess has wound up the season in brilliant style in the Polytechnic walking handicap by cutting records from nine to fourteen miles. Considering that he has recently been training for only short distances, his feat was all the more remarkable. Amongst other walkers who did well were Dover and Goldsmith.

The death of Mr. Frank Playford, the veteran amateur oar, at the age of seventy-three, will be much regretted by oarsmen, and especially by members of the London R.C. His training days were marked by a routine of Spartan severity, and his long life is a good answer to those croakers who cry that those who love athletics die young.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—The "Bears" have had a foretaste this week of what is likely to happen to them in the more active period upon which we have now entered, always provided that no further unfavourable incidents come to their rescue. One of the circumstances which has acted favourably upon the markets was undoubtedly the more genial weather, and, although this cannot be relied upon to continue, it will doubtless have improved the traffics which are about to be announced.

A Moderate Improvement

has taken place in most departments, the other favourable features being greater ease in the Money market and more reassuring advices with reference to the Armenian question, the Czar's visit to Balmoral having tended to bring about a better understanding between this country and Russia as regards the policy to be pursued with regard to Turkey. The efflux of gold has for the time been stopped altogether, and not only has more Japanese money been released, but large dividend-payments are increasing the surplus funds, with the result that a distinct decline has taken place in the value of money. It is not to be expected that the Bank rate will be put down again in a hurry, but the scare about dearer money is completely exploded, and one of the first results has been a distinct recovery in all gilt-edged securities, from Colonial Inscribed stocks to Home Railway Prior Charges and British Corporation stocks. Consols, too, have displayed a much stronger tone, and had it not been for a large cash sale, which was made on Friday apparently for Continental account, we should already have had a higher price than 110⅜. In the absence of any further large cash sales, I quite look for a further advance, more especially as Government purchases for the Sinking Fund and the Post Office Savings' Bank cannot be much longer delayed. It is true that a moderate contango was charged at the Consol settlement, but this was caused chiefly by the delivery of some stock, for there can be no doubt that the "Bear" commitments are very large in consequence of the persistent sales which have been going on "as a hedge" for some time. The recovery in other gilt-edged securities is less justified, and seems to have gone quite far enough. My anticipation that Home Railway stocks would improve very considerably when once the weather and monetary position cleared up, has been fully realised, an improvement of from one to two points having been established all round the market American Rails have displayed great strength, as it is being realised more and more that the silver agitator Bryan will have no chance at the Presidential Elections. The financial position in the United States has also been greatly improved by the arrival there of large sums of gold, and there has been a growing disposition on this side to effect purchases at the present low level, the low-priced stocks finally coming into special demand. The Foreign market is not quite happy, the postponement of the Spanish Loan having caused great disappointment in Paris. In the Mining market prospects appear to be brightening. It is true that the Kaffir Circus has not maintained the temporary improvement which was established at one time, but the progress of the mining industry in the Transvaal is so steady that an advance in values cannot be far off. In West Australians the "Bears" are less confident, a batch of satisfactory crushings having again demonstrated the growing producing power of the West Australian goldfields, while many of the "Bear" rumours have been disproved. Barring accidents, in fact, the ursine party is likely to have a bad time of it in the near future. General trade is distinctly improving. One of the feathers that show how the wind blows is an all-round rise in freights and a considerable scarcity of tonnage. This is one of the surest signs of growing prosperity.

Rally in Home Rails.

As the fear of dear money and the unfavourable political outlook have put down prices of Home Railway stocks, it is only fair that the disappearance of these should act as a support to the market, more especially as Jupiter Pluvius has not been quite so much in evidence of late. The improvement has been most important in the Southern passenger stocks, Brighton "A" being up at 178¼, Dover "A" at 102¼. The latter stock more particularly showed great strength, which is not surprising when the large traffic increases and the savings in expenses are considered. The last weekly traffic of the South Eastern, showing an increase of £3,500, was particularly satisfactory. The Heavies are also from one to two points higher; but, as I have already explained, their position is not so promising, and the small improvement has already brought about realisations. A sharp rally has taken place in South-Western securities, and the Scotch section has displayed temporary firmness. Both "Coras" and North British Deferred are now quoted ex-dividend, the distributions having been more than recovered. But Caledonian Deferred ("Coras") at 57½ x.d., and North British Deferred at 44⅜ x.d., are still remarkably cheap, as there has been absolutely no reason for the previous decline, which was due entirely to the shake-out of weak "Bulls." Significant buying from the North has been noticed of late, and a purchase of both these Deferred stocks looks very promising. Metropolitan Districts have again been an active market, touching at one time 35, and reacting to 33¼. The market is still full of "Bears," who do not appear to realise that the new deep-level electric express scheme will altogether change the position. When they come to their senses, which will no doubt take place when the circular announcing the new scheme to the shareholders is issued in a few days, they will probably find the market many points higher.

The Yankee Market Broadening.

Yankee Rails, more than any other securities, have severe periods of depression, in the course of which operators become so completely disgusted both with the methods of American manipulators and with the shortcomings of the management of the Roads, that every now and then those who have been disappointed in this market vow and declare that they will never touch Yankees again. Rarely have these solemn vows been heard more persistently than during the protracted time of slump which has characterised the Yankee market as a consequence of the last financial crisis and the subsequent silver agitation. At one time, moreover, the outlook as regards the Presidential election was so dubious that inaction was doubtless the safest policy. A distinct change has come over the scene during the last few weeks, and strong manifestations of Republican strength at the various State Elections confirm the growing conviction that the victory of Mr. McKinley is practically assured. One of the most promising events was the immense Republican majority of 49,000 in the Maine State Election, which makes it certain that the New England States—with their thirty-nine electoral votes—will be for McKinley. According to the calculation made by one of my American contemporaries, which seems particularly well informed, it is almost certain that the same influences will give to the Republican candidates the other Eastern States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware. There are thus five more States, having 89 electoral votes, making a total of 128 in the East. With this start McKinley would need only the votes of six of the central Western States to ensure his election—Illinois, 24; Indiana, 15; Iowa, 13; Michigan, 14; Ohio, 23; Wisconsin, 12. These States have 101 electors, which would bring the total to 229, or five more than are required for an election. This leaves twenty-eight from which to make up any possible losses. Counting Maryland, Michigan and Indiana as doubtful, the Republicans could look to making good their thirty-seven votes from other doubtful States, such as Kentucky, Minnesota, Nebraska, Missouri, Louisiana, Texas and California, which have together seventy-nine electors. If this calculation be correct, as I believe it is, the outlook for McKinley's election is reasonably certain; and this is, of course, the all-important influence as regards the market. If the Republican Party wins, the business of the country from one end of it to the other will, as Mr. Henry Clews puts it in his last circular, become so active as to fairly boil over; because the business-man everywhere would know that it means stability, as against what the election of Mr. Bryan would mean, viz., uncertainty for another four years. An all round advance in American Railroad stocks and bonds would be a foregone conclusion, and this would be far more important than the moderate recovery which has so far come about. It is not surprising to find that, with the improved outlook as regards the Presidential election, there should at last have developed in this country a disposition to buy American Railroad stocks. Not only are some of the jobbers, who had left the American market some time ago for the Kaffir Circus, returning to their old love, but there has been a fair amount of public buying, and business is distinctly broadening. It was quite refreshing to find the Erie king, who had held aloof so long, once again bidding for thousands. The rise has been most important in the stocks which I have pointed out for some time as the most promising—viz., Milwaukee, which are quoted 73 ex. the dividend of 2 dols., against 61¾, the lowest point this year; while Louisville at 44½ show a considerable improvement on the quotation of 39 which was marked only a few weeks ago. Denver Prefs., too, stand at 44¼, against 37¼, the lowest touched this year. Atchison Preference shares at 21⅛ also are materially higher. In Louisville there is still a considerable "Bear" account, which is likely to push the price up further; but now that the better-class stocks have experienced so great an advance, there is a growing disposition to buy the low-priced stocks, which can be had at almost knock-out quotations. The junior securities of the re-constructed roads, for instance, on which very heavy assessments have been paid, stand very little higher than the amount of these assessments; and it is argued with considerable force that there is practically no risk in purchasing these, with every prospect of large profits. Look for instance at the stocks of the Southern Railway, which has been placed upon a thoroughly sound basis by the payment of large assessments. In the first year after re-organisation the gross earnings were 17,114,791 dols., and the net earnings 5,141,615 dols. Deducting interest and other charges, a balance of 895,744 dols. remained, which was carried forward. In the second year, which ended on June 30, 1896, the whole of the system was operated so that further charges ranked for interest. Therefore, notwithstanding an increase of 2,000,000 dols. in gross earnings, the net surplus was comparatively small, and the surplus was only 556,478 dols., making the total surplus now standing to the credit of profit and loss 1,452,222 dols, which is available for the Preferred stockholders. This would be equal to 2½ per cent. on the Preferred, and as, when this consolidated system has been at work for a year or more, a considerable decrease in the expenses may be anticipated, prospects are distinctly promising. A small dividend on the Preferred stock is expected by the end of the year, and as Southern Preferred, which stood as high as 44¾ in 1895, are now quoted at only 26, they should be, under all the circumstances, a good purchase on the present reaction. Southern Ordinary, upon which also heavy assessments have been paid, are quoted at the nominal price only of 9, and this stock should certainly rise with the Prefs. Erie Prefs. and Ordinary are attracting a good deal of attention. For the seven months to June 30 the net earnings of the reorganised Company reached 4,195,000 dols., while prior charges and rentals amounted to 4,044,000 dols., so that the surplus profit was 152,000 dols. For July and August the net earnings amounted to 1,640,000 dols., and as the last quarter of the year is usually the best the result will be improved by the earnings during that period. Fixed charges are therefore provided for by the present earnings, and with the improved business to be looked for after the Presidential election, it is probable that a considerable amount will be available for a dividend on the First Prefs. As the Statist calculates, to pay 4 per cent. on the First Prefs., the net surplus available after paying fixed charges must amount to 1,200,000 dols. It will be seen that there is every prospect of a portion of this dividend being earned in the near future, and Erie Prefs. now quoted 33 are one of the best purchases in the lower-priced securities. Erie Ordinary have improved to 14¾, and there has been a large business in this favourite speculative stock. Considering that in the late reorganisation an assessment of 12 dols. was paid, this must be considered a promising speculation; and on these four stocks no fresh assessment need be feared. Another low-priced stock which is attracting attention, and may be suitable for a gamble, is Union Pacifics, which have been largely dealt in at 7. Two circumstances, by the way, should be borne in mind in judging the financial and commercial outlook in the United States. In the first instance the wholesale selling of American securities in Europe has come to an end, and moderate purchases have taken their place. Secondly, the rise in grain, and the shortage in wheat, &c., in a number of other countries, has enabled American farmers to realise a considerable portion of their stocks, which are being exported, and also tend to turn the balance of trade in favour of the producing country. The curious circumstance has arisen that in consequence of the failure of the crops in India, cargoes of grain are being despatched thither from California. There has also been an improved demand for American Railroad bonds, and there is no doubt that, as we get nearer the American Presidential election, these will recover a portion of the decline. On no account ought holders to sell now. Canadian Pacifics have improved to 60; and Grand Trunks have also recovered in sympathy with the American market. There was a traffic increase of £21,400 for the fourth week of September, which was, however, partly due to the fact that there was an extra working day this year as compared with last year.

Foreigners and South Americans.

Efforts have been made to bring about a recovery in Spanish, but without success. The disappointment about the postponement of the Quicksilver Loan is still very great, and the quotation has dropped to 61¾. Italians and Russians have also been weaker, and it does not look now as if the Paris Bourse could get up any special boom during the Tsar's visit to Paris. On the contrary, it is now being predicted that this visit will greatly interfere with dealings. Turks are not quite so firm as they were, although there is no really unfavourable news with reference to the Armenian question. Less attention has been paid to Argentine Government stocks. There is a complete deadlock with regard to the carrying-out of the unification scheme, and the large issuing houses are keeping aloof. The Argentine Government is now being urged in certain quarters to promulgate the scheme and leave the conversion optional, but this would be a very lame measure. The stocks of the Argentine unguaranteed railway lines have been firm on the satisfactory results obtained during the last half-year. We have now Buenos Ayres Great Southern Ordinary at 137, Buenos Ayres Western at 12½, Central Argentine at 85½ x.d., Buenos Ayres and Rosario at 69 x.d. I have already stated that the Central Argentine has achieved better results than the Buenos Ayres and Rosario, and now we have the reports of the Buenos Ayres Western and Buenos Ayres Great Southern showing yet more favourably. The gross receipts of the Buenos Ayres Western for the year ended June 30 increased as much as £184,927, and as the working expenses have been reduced to 41,042, the net revenue is as much as £113,783. The Directors are therefore able to pay 6 per cent. on the Ordinary shares, as against 5½ per cent. last year, and 6 per cent. on the Deferred shares, which received nothing in the previous year. The Buenos Ayres Great Southern had an increase of £172,324 in gross receipts, for the year ending June 30, the net receipts showing an increase of £102,633, thus enabling the Directors to transfer £45,000 to the reserve fund, and to make up the ordinary dividend for the year to 5½ per cent. against 5 per cent. for the previous year. This is very satisfactory and fully confirms the anticipations which I expressed a year or two back when most of my contemporaries were urging the sale of all these stocks at bottom prices. Uruguay bonds are fluctuating within narrow limits, and they certainly deserve attention on the part of investors. The old loan stands at 49⅝ with the dividend to come off on November 1. The new loan has just received its quarterly dividend of 1¼ per cent., and stands at 67½ xd., being an excellent purchase. Chilians are somewhat steadier, and there really is no reason for anxiety. These stocks would have been stronger if the last loan had been better placed, but this will right itself in time. Mexican bonds have been strong as usual; and Mexican Rails have had a further advance, notably in the First Prefs. and Ordinary, an optimistic tone prevailing with regard to all things Mexican.

The Kaffir Circus.

Although the improvement in Consols and the decline in the Money Market caused a temporary recovery in South African shares, the improvement has not been maintained. It showed, however, that the "Bears" are very fidgety, and at one time quite a little skedaddle took place, which was, however, stopped by heavy Paris selling. Paris is, in fact, the weak spot, and whenever a little improvement takes place our French neighbours appear to be slipping stock. One of these days these taps will no doubt dry up; but in the meantime Paris is scared, and this is not perhaps surprising, as investors in France have chiefly been led to embark their money in a number of rubbish stocks foisted upon them by unscrupulous promoters, and also in those gambling counters against which I have so persistently warned my readers—viz., Chartered, Rand Mines, Limited, Consolidated Goldfields, and East Rands. It is now dawning upon them that they made a mistake in their selection, and that especially in East Rands they have embarked in a most undesirable security. As regards Rand Mines, Limited, it is no secret that during the recent slump a complete collapse was feared, and it is the talk of the market that M. Porges came over from Paris specially to support that stock, which might otherwise have crumbled away in view of the very unfavourable news with regard to the deep levels. Even now deep level mines are far above their real values, when the enormous difficulties of working at such a depth are considered. The position of the outcrop mines on the Rand is far more satisfactory. Yet the shares in these have fallen with the Deep Levels, and without any adequate reason. Matters must, of course, right themselves in the end, and now that the settlement has been got over without any of the disastrous failures which were predicted by the "Bears," while rates indicated a considerable short account, we may have an improvement any day. It may be gradual, as we cannot expect a boom at present; but it is only a question of a few months for that more important upward movement to come which is so fully justified by the position. The "Bear" points are disappearing one after the other. It had been predicted that the reduction of wages of the natives on October 1 would lead to disturbances. The cable news is to the effect that the reduction has been peaceably accepted by the "boys," and thus a very large saving in the cost of labour—viz., 33 per cent.—is effected. What that means is easy to calculate, as the cost of native labour on the Rand is estimated at £2,000,000 sterling. Even if the saving were only 25 per cent., this would mean half a million economised by the various mines, which is a very important item. Native labour on the Rand is very plentiful, partly owing to the rinderpest and the scarcity of mealies; while the beneficial effects of the Liquor Prohibition Bill will also tend to raise the working capacity of the "boys," who, after their drunken bouts, were often incapacitated for work for several days. The Press-gagging Bill is, of course, a most unsatisfactory development of Boer narrow-mindedness, but it does not affect the mining industry. A good deal has been made by the ursine party of a statement alleged to have been made in a libel action brought in Hamburg by Mr. Alfred Beit against the Hamburger Nachrichten, that Mr. Beit considered that certain of his projects directed against the Transvaal had only failed temporarily. The fine of twenty marks which was all the Editor of my German contemporary had to pay for libelling Mr. Alfred Beit by printing his private letters, will not prove much of a solatium for the latter, especially as it was accompanied by a pronouncement of the Court that the Jameson raid was an infamous and piratical act. But I completely exonerate Mr. Beit of any intention to execute another raid on the Transvaal. After the experience which he and Mr. Rhodes have had of this matter, and in view of the strong measures which the Boers have taken to be prepared for all eventualities, it is not likely that the excursion to the Transvaal will be repeated. Referring to the market movements in the various gold mining shares I may place on record that most of the improvements in sound Witwatersrand properties have been lost in sympathy with the fall in the gambling counters above referred to. Randfontein, of the Robinson group, have maintained a steady front at from 2⅝ to 2¾; and the moment a general upward movement takes place we may look for a sharp advance in these, and in the various sub-Companies of the Randfontein. Langlaagte Estate looks promising, and, for the matter of that, all the Witwatersrand mines, such as Knights, City and Suburban, Durban Roodepoort, Ferreira, Geldenhuis, Meyer and Charlton, Robinson, Simmer and Jack, Wemmer, Wolhuter, &c., are bound to rise to a higher level. The Barnato stocks were at one time much firmer, notably Barnato Banks and Johannesburg Consolidated Investment shares, but they reacted again with the general market. I again express regret at the absence of any public statement by Mr. B. I. Barnato with reference to the information he was able to gather on the occasion of his last visit to the Transvaal. It would have been far preferable if the measures recently taken for the increase of the capital of the New Primrose, and for the removal of a portion of the Glencairn battery to the Glenluce, had been foreshadowed and discussed before being sprung on the shareholders. I do not by any means wish to imply that the measures taken are not judicious, and in the best interests of the Companies; but shareholders now-a-days expect to be consulted and enlightened, and not to be treated as children. The same applies to the amalgamation of the Barnato Bank and other properties with the Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Corporation. By the way the dividend-warrants on the latter have now been posted to the shareholders, and I should like to know when the market is going to settle the Porges Randfontein bonus of ¼, as these shares must now have arrived here. With reference to the Royal Sheba, my enterprising contemporary, the African Critic, states that having made inquiries on the spot with regard to the alleged crushings of 525 tons, yielding 118 oz. 2 dwt. of smelted gold in July, it has ascertained that instead of having crushed 525 tons only, the Company really crushed 1,208 tons. The average yield was therefore only 1 dwt. 22 gr. per ton, as against the stated average of nearly 4 dwt. 12 gr. per ton. This is so serious a charge, that the Directors of this concern ought to at once furnish an explanation. The announcement by the Geldenhuis Estate of a dividend of 2s. 6d. per share is satisfactory under all the circumstances, especially as a cash balance of £8,000 remains after making provision for the dividend; and present profits also appear to be good. To judge from the annual report of the New Modderfontein Company I do not see that the recent criticisms are altogether justified, as, according to this report, an average assay of 14 dwt. per ton has been obtained from the large body of ore now developed. Klerksdorp Estates have again suffered severely, and at one time were as low as 8s. 9d. on predictions that a reconstruction would be necessary for want of capital. This is now contradicted, but such contradictions generally end in the original rumour proving correct. Diamond shares have suffered in the general reaction, and are but little better for the week. De Beers are quoted at 28¾, and New Jagersfontein at 9⅜ xd.

Golden West Australia.

According to cablegrams just to hand, the revenue of Western Australia for the quarter ending September 30, amounted to £681,205, against £317,878 in the same period of 1895. The revenue for the month of September was £251,078, against £116,922 in September, 1895. The exports of gold in September from Western Australia are cabled as 35,301 oz., against 29,517 oz. in August. These are large figures, showing the great prosperity which the Colony has achieved. I have no doubt that they will be belittled by certain carping critics on this side who are out of the swim, and by some of the scribes in other Australian colonies whose intense jealousy leads them to make disparaging remarks on the West Australian Goldfields, even though they have subsequently to eat their own words. There was at one time persistent weakness in the West Australian market, which was fostered by various "Bear" rumours, amongst which was the report that a certain firm connected with West Australia was in difficulties. If this was so, the trouble has been arranged, and the market is now showing strong signs of recovery. Yet it cannot permanently recover if another big rush of new companies is attempted, and I wish herewith specially to warn promoters that they must not now again attempt to float dozens of new ventures dealing with undeveloped properties. The big dealers in the West Australian market have set their faces against these, and I am glad to see that one of the strongest groups in this department has expressed a firm intention not to bring out another new mine before the turn of the year. This, of course, means that those managing this group will develop the properties which they have acquired, and bring them to the point when they are ready to crush before appealing to the public, and this is what the investing public should demand in every other case. It will be very easy for them to impress this upon promoters by refusing to subscribe to new Companies which do not fulfil this requirement, and rather to devote their attention to the older Companies which already show results, or are about to crush, and in connection with which such a disappointment as has happened for, instance, with Hannan's True Blue need not be feared. Many of the mines recently offered are only prospects, and altogether unsuitable for flotation. After this brief digression, I return to the present position of the West Australian market. In the first instance, what the public very properly insist upon as the first condition is actual results. A number of very satisfactory crushing results have been announced this week, which I give herewith in tabular form :—

	Tons of ore crushed.	Oz. of gold.	Assay of tailings per ton.
Great Boulder	720	2,318	—
Lake View Consols ...	675	2,093	—
Mainland Consols ...	359	1,447	½ oz.
Lady Shenton	262	1,095	—
Hit or Miss	240	727	—
Great Boulder Main Reef	217	521	1 oz. 12 dwt.
Desirable Proprietary ...	100	214	—
Consolidated Murchison...	940	406	—
Glenloth	101	156	16 dwt.
Coolgardie Mint and Iron King	30	115	15 dwt.
Champion Extended and Home Rule	24	75	—

Five important crushings, those of the Great Boulder, Lake View Consols, Mainland Consols, Lady Shenton and Hit or Miss are very satisfactory. Mines which can produce such quantities of gold and give such a yield per ton, suffice to establish the fame of the West Australian Goldfields. It is satisfactory to find that several other new mines have commenced to fall into line with trial crushings, and amongst these the Desirable Proprietary and the Champion Extended and Home Rule deserve special attention. This should effectually silence the bilious talk of some of my contemporaries who have hitherto confined their attention to South African mines. Cable information reports very favourable developments in neighbouring mines of the Great Boulder, and there has also been a fresh batch of very satisfactory news concerning the Lake View Consols, the shares in which advanced at one time to 8, reacting to 7¾. The official application for a special settlement of these shares has now been made, and it is probable that it will be granted in the course of the present week. If so, you may look out for some lively dealings, for it is no secret that many thousands of shares in the Lake View Consols have been sold here against shares in the old Lake View Company, the certificates in exchange for which will not be available for another month. Mainland Consols are firmer at 2⅝, and if crushings continue at the present rate, they will very likely further improve. I retain my very favourable view of Hannan's Golden Group and Golden Treasure, and there is little doubt that it will not be long before West Australian Exploring and Finance and London and Globe Finance will score an important advance on the present quotation of 4⅜ to 4½. The Hampton Plains meeting furnished an opportunity to Mr. Allen H. P. Stoneham to place the very favourable possibilities of these properties before the shareholders; and it is surprising that these shares should remain at 3 15/16, with 4s. per share to come off as return of capital. I may mention that a cablegram has been received confirming the discovery referred to as "Majors" at the general meeting. The information is to the following effect:—"Hampton Goldfields selection, 'Block 53.' Have struck rich ore on the 70-ft. level. The width of the reef is 3 ft., assaying 10 oz." The excellent Lady Shenton crushing should be of good promise to other ladies of the same family, notably Lady Lochs, which are firmer on the return of the financier who is closely connected with them. West Australian Joint Stock Trust shares have been fairly steady at 3¾ premium. The issue of a batch of reports of the West Australian Venture group is expected this week, and very satisfactory results are spoken of. A complimentary dinner was offered on Thursday at the Hotel Cecil to Mr. L. H. Goodman by the West Australian (Gold District) Trading Corporation, of which he is managing director; Sir Malcolm Fraser, the Agent-General for West Australia, being in the chair. Some very interesting particulars were given of the progress made by this Company from small beginnings, and much interest was manifested in the dry-crushing process, the merits of which Mr. Goodman described in responding to the toast. Some very favourable news was also announced with reference to a gold property which the Company has acquired. I stated some time ago that Mr. Goodman had refused a service of gold plate in recognition of the services he has rendered to the Corporation, and it is satisfactory to learn that the sum in question is to be devoted to the establishment of a hospital in Coolgardie, for which the Hampton Plains Estate Company has generously provided a site free of expense. To judge from the talk in the West Australian market, there must be a great many "Bears" of the shares of the Trading Company, and, from what I can hear of the market position, I should not be surprised to hear of a very bad squeeze in the Ordinary and especially in the Founders' shares. Very favourable advices are to hand by mail from the Maritana Mine, which is shortly to be acquired by an English Company. According to my West Australian contemporaries, the property is opening out well since operations were resumed, and the main shaft (which has been sunk to a depth of 104 ft.) had passed through the rich western lode. The eastern lode, which is described at 13 ft. wide, is also opening up well, and there is a consensus of opinion among mining men that these two lodes and the middle reef will make into one big body at a depth. All three lodes are described as wide and rich, and as going down with every sign of permanency. The Maritana is therefore a proved mine, which, moreover, has an ample water supply; and under these circumstances it belongs to the more desirable class of West Australian properties. I I notice that on the Board of the London and Colonial Exploration and Finance Company, Limited, is Sir Somers Vine. It would be interesting to know whether Sir Somers Vine had relinquished his connection with the Imperial Institute before going into West Australian exploring and finance. The reconstruction of the McCulloch's Coolgardie Gold Mines, Limited, is one of those disappointing events which have been pretty numerous in Western Australian mining, owing to the want of foresight in providing the necessary working capital. I may here remark that I have never seen my way to recommend this concern, which has certainly been very badly mismanaged, and the occurrence again points the lesson that it is important that investors should only put their money into Companies which are connected with strong groups, that know how to take care of their sub-Companies. Amongst undesirable West Australian mining Companies for which it is sought to obtain public support is the Chandler's Reward Gold Mines, Limited. The original reports appear to have been glowing; but the manager finally reported unfavourably, and so the curious expedient of offering a bonus of a fully-paid share for every two shares subscribed is resorted to. If the property is however so undesirable as to be unfavourably reported upon by the manager, even this bait is not likely to draw the much-wanted subscriptions. I have received several of the circulars which are being sent out by Henry Leaver, 23, Maiden-lane, Strand, London, in which that gentleman offers 200 fully-paid shares in the Mount Yagahong Gold Mining and Exploration Company, Limited, at par. I should say that these promiscuous offers are not likely to increase the value of Mount Yagahong shares. New high-class hotels are to be erected in Perth, Coolgardie, and elsewhere in Western Australia. It is hardly necessary to say that there is great need of better accommodation in that colony owing to the vast inrush of newcomers. In fact, I am informed that the shortcomings of the sanitary and other arrangements made for the comfort of visitors in the hotels in Perth beggar all description. I notice that one of the subjects to be discussed by the West Australian section of the London Chamber of Commerce this week is the suggestion that the West Australian Government should be asked to publish official returns of the goldfields, through their Agent-General here, monthly. I urged, in TRUTH of September 10, the desirability of the West Australian Government arranging for official returns to be made monthly by the various Wardens on the goldfields, under the superintendence of the Minister of Mines, and it is certainly advisable that so useful a measure should be introduced.

Indian, New Zealand, and Other Mines.

It is hardly likely that the Indian mining section could flourish while all the other departments of the Mining market were in the dumps; but just at the last a recovery is marked, more especially in Mysore Gold, which now stand at the highest price recently touched—viz., $8\frac{7}{16}$. Champion Reefs and Nundydroog are also firmer. On the other hand, Mysore Goldfields are easier at $1\frac{1}{16}$, and are really a very cheap purchase, considering the great possibilities of the Company. In Australian shares, other than West Australian, Aladdin's Lamp have rallied to $2\frac{3}{4}$. The crushing, just announced, of 3,011 oz. is again very satisfactory. Charters Towers shares have been quiet, although Day Dawn Block have hardened. Mount Morgan, Bendigo, and Mount Lyell are lower. Croydon mines are on the up-grade. Not only are North Croydon Consols very strong at 3s. 9d., but Croydon Consols, which are now quoted 8s. 9d., appear to be on the eve of a further important improvement. A very favourable report for the period ending June 1 last has just been issued, according to which the crushings have realised the value of £16,759, giving an average of 2 oz. 16 dwt. 17 gr. per ton; while the latest returns have been much better than the first. The profit and loss account for the year showed a profit of £7,745, out of which £5,000 had been distributed as a first dividend of 3d. per share. But since June 1 very important crushings have taken place, larger both in quantity and in the ratio of gold obtained per ton, the total returns so far being thereby brought up to 23,859 oz. of gold. This allowed a further distribution of £5,000, or 3d. per share, to be made in August; but I understand that the further crushings are so large, and the yield so high, that within a short time a very large dividend (probably 1s. per share) will be declared. The average yield of gold per ton has been steadily increasing, the last returns showing $6\frac{1}{2}$ oz. to the ton. It will be seen, therefore, that even the present quotation of 8s. 9d. per 5s. share, 4s. 6d. paid, is exceedingly low, and it is not unlikely that Croydon Consols will double their present price in the near future. I may be allowed to take some credit to myself for having recommended these shares from 4s. 6d. upwards. As the North Croydon Consols immediately adjoins this property, the great improvement in the older mine naturally reflects upon the newer one, the shares in which are still at a very moderate level. In New Zealand mines a slight recovery is noticeable in Waihi; but nearly all the other shares in this section have been dull, London and New Zealand Exploration being more particularly flat. There has also been a relapse in Waitekauri, Woodstock, Hauraki, and Taitapu; while most of the low-priced shares too have suffered. This should be a warning to promoters not to force any more new issues on the market. I have to make a correction with regard to my remarks concerning the Moanataiari Gold Mining Company, Limited, in last week's issue. I stated that the capital was £200,000. This is the amount of the nominal capital, while the actual capital issue is £170,000, the remaining 30,000 shares of £1 each being held in reserve. The market is firmer at $1\frac{3}{8}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$. In the general foreign section improvements are marked in Tolima "A" and "B," and Pestarena; but there have been declines in Dolcoath, Richmond, Frontino and Bolivia, De Lamar, and Dickens Custer. Grand Central of Mexico have fluctuated somewhat; but the results for September were again very satisfactory, and it is likely that the shares will improve upon the present quotation of $2\frac{1}{2}$.

New Enterprises and Issues.

The prospectuses of the following new Companies and issues have been placed before the public during the week:—

The New Beeston Brewery Company, Limited.—This Company has been formed to acquire and carry on the Beeston Brewery Company, Beeston, Nottingham, and the licensed houses belonging thereto. The share capital is fixed at £280,000, in Ordinary and Cumulative Preference shares. In addition to this, it is proposed to issue £140,000 Mortgage Debenture stock, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.

This appears to be a compact Brewery, having all the requirements for carrying on a good business. There are eighty freehold and leasehold houses and other properties, situated in the towns of Leicester and Nottingham, while, according to the report of a leading firm of accountants, the trade has been steadily increasing from 1892-93, when the profits amounted to £13,755, to £31,123 in 1895-96. The latter amount would leave the substantial sum of close upon £15,000 for distribution amongst the Ordinary shareholders, and as profits are stated to have further increased during the past six months, these earnings can evidently be depended upon as a basis for future results It is satisfactory to find that the firm take a considerable portion of all three classes of securities.

British Dominions Exploration, Limited.—This Company has been formed to carry on operations as an Exploration and Finance Company. The capital is fixed at £250,000 in shares of £1 each.

In TRUTH of September 17 I drew attention to the registration of this Company, showing that it proposed to cover everything on the whole globe from the purchase of mines to the settling of land, the making of railways, &c., in a small or large way. I have since discovered that advance copies of the prospectuses have been extensively circulated, some of them being accompanied by a letter or circular from Mr. Mackusick, of the Universal Stock Exchange, and others, by one from Dr. Aubrey, of Croydon—the author of a work on Stock Exchange investments. I presume that this attempt at a private flotation has not been successful, hence this appeal to the public. There is absolutely nothing else that the promoters have to offer for the sum they ask than an option of acquiring certain lands in Australia, and it is a puzzle to me how they have induced a noble lord, a baronet, and three other gentlemen to allow their names to be used or in any way to become connected with so doubtful a venture.

The Midland Fire Insurance Corporation, Limited.—This Corporation has been established to undertake all kinds of insurance business with the exception of Life. It is proposed to act independently of the Tariff Companies, and to rate each risk upon its own individual merit. The share capital is £500,000 in 100,000 shares of £5 each.

My Letter Box.

I am once again obliged to remind my readers that I can only reply to communications which are accompanied by the names and addresses of the writers, not, of course, for publication, but as a token of good faith. All anonymous letters will be consigned to the waste-paper basket. Some delay must necessarily occur in answering questions which entail special inquiries, and it is, as a rule, not possible to attend in the current issues to communications which arrive after Friday. My correspondents will also greatly simplify my task by reading my weekly letters carefully through, as these frequently contain remarks on the very subjects on which information is sought. I again repeat that I can accept no fees for replies in "My Letter Box," and that I cannot undertake to answer by letter or telegram. I must also absolutely refuse to execute any orders for stocks or shares, or to act as an intermediary in any way. It is necessary to number the different stocks on which information is sought. The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

J. W. W.—Yes, the Chinese Loan in question seems to be well worth the present quotation. Doubtful, Norfolk.—If you are a holder of Rupee Paper, there seems to be no reason for selling at present. O. S.—There is very little difference between the two Chilian Loans in question. S. N. P.—Argentine Government stocks are fair value at present prices; but there is no temptation to buy until more is known about the carrying out of the unification scheme.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

C. W. A., Leicester, and W. H. V., Galway.—I cannot reply by letter. You cannot be regular readers of Truth, or else you would have heeded the many warnings I have given against having any dealings with F. Hemming Custance, the syndicate tout, 50 and 51, Lime-street, London, E.C. I specially referred to his having taken French leave in Truth of September 17. You have but yourselves to blame for being victimised. Ashford.—No; I do not advise this class of investment. North Yorks.—1. I do not like the "system" of this outside concern; have nothing to do with it. 2. I am very much against it. 3. No. H. B., Leicester.—I have repeatedly stated that I do not approve of "Our own investment system" of Douglas, Hungerford, & Williams, 5, Copthall-buildings, London, E.C. You should only deal through members of the Stock Exchange. H. P. L.—Many thanks for the information given concerning Frank Tarrant & Co. You will find that I have on many occasions referred to these syndicate touts in Truth, but I am making use of the information you send in to-day's issue. A. B., Southport.—I am not at all surprised that on answering this advertisement offering employment you received a batch of circulars inviting you to become an agent of the Provident Association of London. To all those who receive these circulars I offer Punch's advice to those about to marry—"Don't."

Home Rails.

W. A. C.—The best thing you can do is to buy more Caledonian Deferred stock to average. I am not so much in favour of Sheffield New. T. W. L.—No reason to sell; Home Rails generally are improving again. H. S.—I would not take profits in the Home Rails you mention yet, as a strong recovery is now on the way, and you will be able to very considerably increase your present profit of £600. P. F.—The best speculative purchases in the Home Railway market at present appear to be Dover "A," Caledonian Deferred (Coras), and North British Deferred. After the exceptional depression, there should be a marked recovery in these.

American and Foreign Rails.

R. P. O.—Amongst the better class American Rails a purchase of Louisville, Erie Prefs., and Southern Railway Prefs. would be advisable; and amongst the low-priced shares Erie and Union Pacifics. A. M., Liverpool.—Yes, I think it is advisable to deposit your bonds of the Leopoldina Railway with the Committee. Only by combination can useful results be obtained. R. N., Bognor.—You should certainly hold your Baltimore and Ohio Six per Cent. bonds of 1902. As the stocks have recovered, so will the bonds advance presently. Salford.—I have never advised the purchase of Grand Trunk Ordinary; but at present you had better hold. I do not recommend the exchange suggested by you. Veritatis.—You should insist upon the delivery of the Nitrate Railway shares bought by you. A. B. C. D.—Yes. T. W.—Yes, I strongly advise you to give your best attention to American Railroad bonds. There has been a heavy fall, and so far there has been but little recovery in sympathy with the stocks. Donegal.—These bonds have depreciated with the rest of the American market; you should hold for a recovery.

Mining Shares.

Heinrich.—The Secretary of the Murchison Diamond and Gold Company ought certainly to furnish to inquiring shareholders every information. Indian.—Hold your mining shares for a further recovery. An improvement cannot be far off, which will enable you to obtain a larger profit. Rusticus.—Yes, I think the time is favourable for the purchase of mining shares, and your list (Nos. 1 to 15) is a good one, and intelligently selected. I like more especially Randfontein (1), Lake View Consols (7), West Australian Exploring and Finance (8), Gladiators (10), North Croydon Consols (12), Croydon Consols (14), and Hampton Plains (15). H. S.—It is advisable to hold Glencairns. The information vouchsafed by the Board might certainly be more explicit, but the Glenluce is virgin ground, and the removal of the battery will doubtless prove beneficial in the end. Newry.—No option but to hold for a general recovery in the West Australian market, but instead of averaging in the same shares, it will be preferable to make purchases in other mines mentioned in my letter under "Golden West Australia." Pat.—Hold the first-named shares and certainly Randfontein, the prospects of which are very satisfactory. Amber. — I should think it would be advisable to pay the call. As regards Abercorn Reefs I can only again insist that the shareholders should combine to obtain their rights. I cannot do it for them. H. H. J.—This Australian mine is certainly promising, but in view of recent developments Croydon Consols and North Croydon Consols are a far better purchase. Flora.—Apply to Elmsie Limited, Bloomfield House, London Wall, E.C. for a prospectus of the North Croydon Consols. Croydon Consols are on the eve of a fresh rise. See remarks under "Indian, New Zealand, and other Mines." A. N. — With reference to your proposed purchase of Mining shares I should think that Nos. 2, 5, 9, and 10, would be preferable. Instead of the others you can make a far better selection from my letter. Neilson. — I advise you not to buy any more Sheba Queen shares. This is an attempt to unload at 5s. Camp.—1. You should certainly hold your Randfontein for a rise, and buy more to average. After all, you have received a bonus of ¼, or 25 per cent. in Porges Randfontein shares. 2. No option but to do so. H. E. W.—1. I understand that the dividend on West Australian Exploring and Finance and London and Globe will be considerably more than that mentioned by you. 2. The advance is expected to bring the shares close up to 7. C. H. D.—There is every prospect of a recovery in the shares Nos. 1-3 when once the rebellion is crushed, but sound Transvaal Gold and Land shares are distinctly preferable. I do not like Willoughby Consols. L., Argyleshire.—I cannot reply by letter. Instead of buying the shares Nos. 1-13, which are not by any means promising, you should make your selection from my letter, and before all not buy extremely low-priced mines, which are not generally the cheapest. Midas.—1. The general slump. 2. Write to the secretary. 3. Not yet; it is an Exploring and Land Company. 4. The address of the Harmony Proprietary is 3, Budge-row, E.C. 5. No. Amongst the shares mentioned under No. 6 I should prefer d (Preece's Point). You can do much better in Croydon Consols, North Croydon Consols, Gladiators, Hannan's Golden Group and Golden Treasure than in the others named. L. P.—Yes, hold the shares for a recovery. Robkery.—Yes, African Estates should be held. Do not heed all the bearish talk. Explorer.—I am not in a position to express any definite opinion of this new mine which you say is about to be floated, but will give my view on its being brought out. As a general rule you can do better in established West Australian Companies than in doubtful new ones. Hold Burbank's Birthday Gift. Yes, you have done wrong not to have followed my advice to realise your profit in Taitapu at 3¾. London Paris Corporation is not one of my recommendations, but the shares are now very cheap. Insider.—1. Very doubtful. 2. This is perhaps going too far. Mild Spec.—No option but to hold on the chance of an improvement. Burton.—The Woodstock (Transvaal) is a very promising mine, and the shares will doubtless rise to a higher level. If you can afford it, you might average by buying more at present price. P. R.—Both mines are promising, and the shares should be held. Ferns.—Yes, you had better join the reconstruction. Pettigrew.—1. I do not advise you to speculate in the system of Douglas Hungerford and Williams. 2. No market for the shares just now. 3. No; you can do better by selecting your shares from my remarks under "Golden West Australia." Fantail.—There should be a chance for this mine now. (4). It will be advisable to hold all your shares for a recovery. J. E. I.—The Abbott's Gold Mine, Limited, has been very disappointing, chiefly owing to gross mismanagement and want of foresight, as is shown by the last report of the manager concerning the famine in "rope." Plunger.—Do not hold Nos. 1-3 too long, but sell on a recovery. You might buy yourself some Croydon Consols. Fin.—Yes, it it is advisable to join the reconstruction. Brooklands.—Certainly not. Hold for a recovery. Chaffers.—A fair mining risk, and likely to improve. Jack and Jill.—Yes, I consider the West Australian (Gold District) Trading Corporation is apparently doing a very good business, and both the Ordinary and Founders' shares are likely to advance. A. M., Shepherd's Bush.—I am afraid that very little is being done in that quarter, and it would be advisable for the shareholders to move independently. G. S. H.—1. Not yet; but the decision is likely to be given soon after the reopening of the Law Courts. 2. I have not changed my view. 3. Yes. Constant Reader, Constantinople.—I do not advise purchase of Sheba Queen. Beta.—No reason for making the exchange. Mancunian.—Hold the Menzies shares, but do not buy any more yet. 2. A promising mine. 3. Yes, Menzies Crusoë should be held. Philbush.—I have no recent information on the Company. A. I. Y.—I cannot reply by letter. I do not believe in manipulation such as is proposed by the Kanowna Syndicate. The documents are returned. Rod.—No, I do not recommend purchase of London and West Australian Exploration at present. West Australian Exploring and Finance are far more promising. 2 and 3. Fair mining risks. J. McI.—1. No reason to sell. The Porges Randfontein mine has just commenced crushing. 2. I cannot exactly endorse this view. The Lake View Consols is already crushing and paying dividends, the other one is not. Alma M. T.—1. No option but to join. 2. Hold your True Blue; but do not buy any more. S. H., Brixton Hill.—You will do well not to have too much to do with low-priced South Africans. Randfontein, Langlaagte Estate, Barnato Banks, Modderfontein "B," Waterfall Estate, Knights, Hendersons, Oceana Consols, Lydenburg Estates, and Mozambique should suit you. Inquirer, Exeter.—Write to the Secretaries of these Companies. Wilmslow.—Hold Barnato Banks, and disregard such trash. No option but to hold the other shares for an improvement. A. W. Z., Bury.—I do not recommend purchase of Nos. 1 and 2. The shares in the North Croydon Consols are 5s., 4s. paid. Somersetshire.—1. The cause is the general slump. 2. Yes. 3 Yes, buy more to average. Circle.—I should prefer Hannan's Golden Treasure. Robin.—1. You should disregard these blackmailing criticisms. Whenever the slump is over all these shares will improve. 2. There is absolutely no market, and the concern appears to have disappeared. F. Lewisham.—Hold all your shares, Nos. 1-6 for a rise. They are all well selected. Exploration, Peckham.—Yes, I prefer West Australian Exploring and Finance shares to "Wags." 2. Yes, after a certain percentage is paid. 3. Yes, much higher. 4. That figure is likely to be attained. Romeo.—A fair mining risk. Lismore, Stockwell.—1. Very doubtful. 2. In such cases it is best to join the reconstruction and to sell after. 3. Ditto. Scottie.—I really cannot give you advice on this subject. I suppose your broker is old-fashioned. Hannan's Golden Treasure and North Croydon Consols are promising mines. Armenia.—I should not advise you to buy these shares. Durham.—1. I do not like this concern at all. 2. Hold for a rise. Monkland.—Yes. There is no option. G. C. K.—No option but to hold True Blue for the present, but I have never thought well of this concern. Hold Burbank's Birthday Gift and Burbank's Consols for a rise. W. W. B.—I do not like Spitzkop. Kitty Flora.—Nos. 1 to 14 are a very mixed lot. I do not like Nos. 3 and 14 at all. No. 13 is also doubtful. No. 2 should recover. The others are fair mining risks, but no particular catch. Nos. 4 and 5 are cheap and likely to advance. Suburb.—Hold Hannan's Mount Ferrum, Croydon Consols, Hannan's Golden Treasure, and North Croydon Consols. I do not care for Hannan's Find. Aladdin's Lamp are promising. Churchgate.—I do not like Golconda, but there is no option but to hold. Hold also West Boulder, Croydon Consols, and North Croydon Consols. I do not care for the other shares, which are very doubtful. Lamplighter.—Hold Transvaal Exploring, Hannan's Golden Treasure, Central and West Boulder for a rise. You ought to number the shares inquired about. No option but to hold the other shares, but do not buy more to average.

Industrial Shares.

Beta.—I do not think much of this concern, and there is no market yet for the shares. Perplexed, Kirkcaldy.—No particular reason for selling; neither do I think there is much chance of an improvement. East Anglian.—I do not like this concern at all, and have repeatedly said so. You do not appear to be a regular reader of Truth. Colon.—Yes, Dunlop Tyre shares are fully paid, and no further call can be made on them. You must take your own course with regard to a sale; but you must remember that it is always worth while taking a good profit when you can get it. J. C.—These brewery shares are a fair investment, but no catch. M. E. V.—I think these shares are quite high enough. M. E. T.—A small industrial venture with regard to which no reliable information is available; but I should not have advised the investment. I cannot reply by letter. An Enquirer, Swansea.—No; I would not like to make myself responsible for advice to speculate in this way.

Mixed Investments.

V. B. G.—1. A fair investment. 2. Somewhat speculative, but not an unsuitable investment. 3. I see no reason for selling Rupee Paper after the recent relapse. X. Y. Z., Barnsley.—No reason for selling your investments A to E. I do not like Stamp Distribution shares (F) at all, and, as far as I know, the Company is in liquidation. No reason to sell G now; and as regards H and I, you must know that this concern is in liquidation. Appalachian.—Amongst your shares Nos. 1 to 5, Golden River Quesnelle are the best, the others are the usual mixed lot of mining shares, which should be sold on an improvement. Engineer.—No reason for selling Nos. 1 to 5 at present. Hold them for a recovery. I think No. 6 is a very doubtful concern, and I do not think much of Nos. 7 and 8. Nos. 9 to 11 are promising. I do not care much for Nos. 12 and 13, and I have repeatedly stated that I do not care for Empress of Coolgardie (14) at all. X. Y. Z.—Before I can answer your queries, you must furnish me with your full name and address as a token of good faith. Aliquis.—1. A fair investment. 2. I do not recommend these. Thanks for the circulars sent; you are quite right to consign such documents to the waste-paper basket. Queensland.—There is no fresh information to give as regards the Australian reconstructed banks; the process of recuperation is very slow. I do not advise investment in the other shares mentioned. Derek.—You should certainly hold all your American bonds and stocks Nos. 1 to 4; they are likely to improve. I do not think much of No. 5. No. 6 is a good property. Nos. 7 to 11 are Mining risks of mixed quality. The Highland Chief (12) is a good mine, and Nos. 13 and 14 are fair South African mines. G., Bournemouth.—I do not think much of No. 1, and as soon as you can make a profit on No. 2 you should take it. A Poor Man.—I certainly consider the Army and Navy Co-operative Breweries a very doubtful concern. Neither do I like the Finance Corporation of Western Australia; but there may be a chance for No. 5. I have certainly never advised investment in Rose of England Mines, but No. 1 is a fair mining risk. Agricola.—If you are a holder of Nos. 1 to 11, you should not sell them, as they will probably improve. I do not think much of No. 12. Aquila Nera.—No reason for selling any of your stocks Nos. 1 to 19. Rabbie Burns, Paisley.—1. A fair industrial concern. 2. There is no market for these at present. 3. At the next session of the Volksraad. 4. Impossible to tell. 6. Yes. 7. No. 8. There would no doubt be an improvement. 9. At present there is no likelihood of a further advance in the Bank rate. 10. I must refer you to my letter. W. S. W., Fermoy.—1. I quite agree with you that the Woodhouse & Rawson liquidation appears to take a very long time, and as a debenture-holder you ought to have had some results by now. You ought to combine with other debenture-holders to obtain some statement from the liquidator. 2. I am afraid you have no claim. Grateful.—1. Have nothing to do with this concern. 2. Yes. 3. A fair risk. Scotia.—I can but say that the best plan is to hold the shares for recovery. C. E., Hull.—1. I do not like these at all. 2. Sell on a recovery; but you ought never to have bought them. 3. No option but to hold. A. R. H.—Nos. 1 and 2 are fair investments. The New Uruguay Loan is a promising investment. Lake View Consols are likely to go much higher. East Wealth of Nations is a different Company to the Wealth of Nations Extended. E., Leamington.—No option but to hold Nos. 1 and 2, and Nos. 3 and 4 should not be sold now. Also hold No. 5. Gunner.—No temptation to buy A and B. C are fair debentures. Canadian Pacifics (D) will no doubt move with the American market. E and F are promising debentures. Roulette.—1. This mine has been very badly managed, and the reef is said to have pinched out; but there is still hope. 2. No. W. W., Liverpool.—1. Yes. 2. Erie shares now stand at 14¾, and are a good purchase. W. H. W.—1. Yes, Readings are promising. 2. Yes. 3. No reason to buy now. 4. Have nothing to do with these outside brokers. Celtic.—1. Yes, the bonus on Randfontein having been deducted on June 16 last, and you having bought on June 10, you are entitled to the bonus of Porges Randfontein shares. 2. The bonus on Randfontein are precisely the Porges Randfontein rights, which are computed at ¼ per share. 3. Yes, Randfontein should be held for a rise, and you should buy more to average. 4. Impossible to tell. 5. I do not consider Cycle Components very promising. 6. Why do you not take your profit? 7. I do not like the Standard Oil Company of Galicia at all. 8. Yes, they should recover in time. 9. I have already expressed my opinion. Clementina.—In view of the rising tendency of the Money market I should advise you to wait with the investment of your £4,000, as a fresh decline in high-class securities is quite on the cards. You should hold Chilians. M. E. A.—1. I should say that under the circumstances the shares in this reconstructed Australian Bank should be held; in fact, there is no option but to do this. 2. You cannot obtain 7 per cent., such as in Uruguay bonds, with absolute safety. If these bonds were absolutely safe they would not stand at the present prices. St. Helen's.—1. There is no market for the shares in Streeter & Company, Limited. 2. Woodstock (Transvaal) shares should be held for an important recovery. The price is now $1\frac{3}{8}$, and the mine is very promising.

Various Investments.

Under the influence of cheaper money and the brightening political outlook, Consols at one time advanced to $110\frac{5}{8}$, but subsequently reacted to $110\frac{3}{8}$, which must have been a great relief to the ursine party. I fancy, however, that their satisfaction will not last long, and that a fresh recovery to at least 111 is probable. Silver has been remarkably quiet, and there has been practically no change from the price of a week ago of $30\frac{1}{4}$d. Rupee Paper remains flat at 62. There have, on the other hand, been advances all round in high-class stocks, including India Stock, and Chinese stocks have also braced up. In Cycle shares very little business has been transacted. Dunlop Deferred remain at $1\frac{1}{2}$, but the Preferred are firmer at $\frac{15}{16}$. Beestons are somewhat better at $3\frac{3}{8}$, but Singer Cycles are lower at $\frac{7}{8}$, which is also the quotation for Cycle Tubes. Allsopps have been fairly steady, and have recovered to 170. There has been a sharp advance in Guinness Ordinary to 560. There is not wanting from time to time a crop of mushroom Companies in the City; but this is the first time I have noticed an appeal for subscriptions to a Company for growing mushrooms. Mr. S. Hardy has written very eloquent letters from Manchester, directing attention to the prospectus of the Manchester Mushroom Growers, Limited, in connection with which he guarantees a dividend of 5 per cent. for the first two years of working. As this has been an exceptionally prolific year for mushrooms, it cannot be said that this promotion comes at a very opportune juncture. Who are Bayliss & Bayliss, 11, Queen Victoria-street, London, E.C.? They are apparently circularising clergymen for the purpose of obtaining deposits for stated periods of six or twelve months. In one circular which is before me they call themselves "a firm of private financiers with a high-class financial connection, conducting a business with the best people on the lines of private bankers," and offer interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum payable monthly, for one year, on sums of not less than £50. In another circular they state that they are "prepared to take sums of £10 for one year (or more) on the following terms:—20 per cent. per annum, payable as follows:—Four quarterly payments of interest, and the principal at the end of one year." Whether the interest offered be 12 per cent. or 20 per cent., I would like to point out to the recipients of the polite invitations of Bayliss & Bayliss that high rates of interest are not compatible with safety. I have repeatedly referred to Frank Tarrant & Co., the syndicate touts, of 70 and 71, Bishopsgate-street, London, E.C., and to the large profits which they boast of obtaining for their clients. The last circular issued by them contained the statement that they had closed a Metropolitan District "deal" at a profit of $587\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. With reference to this boast, a correspondent writes to point out that it was quite impossible to have bought any large amount of Metropolitan District stock on September 1 at $26\frac{1}{2}$, as stated by Frank Tarrant & Co.; and it would be interesting to know what amount these people actually did buy. But more interesting is the statement made by my correspondent that, having an inquiry from a country gentleman, who, being hard up, was tempted by the circulars of these touts, he took the trouble to call at 70 and 71, Bishopsgate-street. He could not find the name of the firm on the notice-board, and, on inquiry from the housekeeper, he learned that the name of Frank Tarrant & Co. was not known there, but that Tarrant & Co. had a small office at the top of the building. He went up to that elevated height, but found the office locked, and there seemed to be no one within. He again inquired of the housekeeper, but only elicited the information that the man and his clerk had been there that day between twelve and one o'clock. This, then, is the great firm of Frank Tarrant & Co., who boast of "Another Magnificent Profit. Our System Vindicated. Our Critics Convinced. Our Clients' Satisfaction Acknowledged."—Your affectionate Uncle,

QUEER STORY.

A CURIOUS COUPLE.

LAST autumn, while on a painting tour in the West of England, it was my good fortune to be put in possession of a very remarkable item of local history. It struck me so much at the time that I determined—although far more expert with the brush than with the pen—to write it out with a view to publication, believing that the mere recital of the facts is in itself an interesting story, quite apart from literary skill or embellishment. I hope that those who read will endorse my belief, and, consequently, that they will overlook, on account of the story itself, that literary crudeness in the telling which no amateur can ever hope to avoid.

The village of R——, in which I was staying, and in which the remarkable events spoken of had occurred, is one of the quaintest little places imaginable. I find in "Kelly" that the population is 190. I should not have imagined it to be nearly so much. I suppose, however, that there are many outlying homesteads, some possibly miles away, which belong to the ecclesiastical parish, and that these contain a considerable fraction of the 190 souls. Certainly, the village itself—meaning the cluster of habitations which gathers round the church and forms the centre of its life and energy—can hardly contain a third of that number.

It is so small, and so out of the way, that you would never find it, except by accident. Indeed, it stands apart in some fields, absolutely concealed in a hollow, and is only approached on one side by a footpath (which, in the winter, is usually under water), on another by a cart-track of the rudest and roughest description. When you do arrive there, the first object to strike you is the church. About this church you will at once notice two remarkable features. The first, that it stands in the middle of a farm homestead, and cannot be approached without either going through the farmer's private garden or his cattle-yard; the second, that (tiny as it is) it is, nevertheless, the longest church for its width that you ever saw—rather resembling a long barn with a square chimney (for the tower is scarcely more imposing) perched upon its western extremity.

And yet there is something pleasing, something grateful to the eye in this grey, plain, disproportioned little structure. It seems to fit into its surroundings admirably: the farm yard, the cottages, the brook flowing just below, (they call it "the river" there, where everything is on so reduced a scale), the ever-present geese and sheep and cattle, and the perfect seclusion of surrounding pastures. Nothing but green whichever way you look. No houses (except the quaint little cluster round the church), no distant view; everything shut in by the slopes which skirt the valley; a complete environment of everlasting fields.

I have seen many churchyards. This one, lying begirt on all sides by the farm homestead, tiny, indifferently kept, shaded by many cypresses and a weeping ash, where scarcely once a year, perhaps, is the slumbering soil disturbed for a new grave, and where everything speaks of dreamy restfulness, this churchyard of R—— is the spot in which I myself would soonest choose to lie. One I knew who now reposes there—a former rector; the kindest, heartiest, tenderest, most beloved of pastors. Those who have since died in R—— have all wished to be laid near him. And now around him sleeps a little cluster of his horny-handed friends. A happy family! The whole churchyard is peaceful. But in that especial corner the peacefulness seems always most profound.

It was this rector's nephew and successor—for R—— has been a family living any time this two centuries past—to whom I am indebted for the following story. He often strolled out with me when I went to paint, and, while smoking innumerable pipes, told me many interesting local yarns. This one, however, the facts of which had lately come under his own experience, quite overtopped all the others in strikingness and peculiarity. Here it is, substantially in my informant's words.

"You see that cottage over there?" he said, pointing to a dismantled hovel in the corner of the field where I had pitched my canvas.

I nodded.

"A most remarkable history is attached to it," he went on. "Not a legend, but a fact. Of this I can assure you, because I myself had a hand in finding it out. It centres round a certain couple who lived there—the most extraordinary old folk that I ever came across. I should like you to have seen them. I think you would have admitted them to be the ugliest pair in England, as they certainly were the most close and unfriendly. During the sixteen years that they lived in that cottage, they never once asked a neighbour inside."

"Umph! Hermits, indeed," I observed.

"Absolute hermits. There was, however, some slight excuse for their eschewing all outside company. Each suffered from a severe physical infirmity. The woman was nearly stone-deaf; the man was dumb. When they first came here—eighteen years ago now, I think—my uncle, who, as you know, was then rector, tried to find out what he could about them. He only learnt a little, and that little was nothing out of the way. It transpired that the man was an ex-sailor of the Royal Navy, who had lost his speech after a severe attack of yellow fever in the West Indies. He was now entitled to a pension, which he drew half-yearly, and which my uncle only knew about by the fact that the old fellow had to come to him periodically and get his papers signed. The woman was his sister, so she gave the neighbours to understand, and so also might have been inferred from a certain family likeness which was noticeable between them. She was a most ill-favoured hag: shrivelled, unkempt, and dirty beyond description. Although she then must have been nearer 70 than 60, her long, touzled hair was still as black as a coal, and hung in hideous untidiness about her hawk-like face, which, with its dark eyes, and its hooked proboscis, was most uncommonly forbidding. The poor people all pronounced her a witch; and, for that reason, gave her a wide berth. Probably the woman purposely encouraged the idea. For her great aim and object was, evidently, to be left alone.

"Although her brother's pension, amounting to about 1s. 11d. a day, was ample to keep two old folks decently, and even comfortably, in that cheapest of neighbourhoods, these two always gave the impression of being half-starved, and I do not believe that either of them purchased a new article of clothing the whole time they lived in R——. From this people began to infer that they were misers, and, as time went on, many things happened to strengthen the inference. All along they had discovered the greatest anxiety and apprehension when any one had tried to gain access to their hovel. Indeed, my uncle has often told me that the expression of the old people's faces when he called there, and one or other of them peered round the chained door at him, was really quite comical in its suspicious trepidation; and the older they grew, the more pronounced did their precautions to prevent outsiders entering become.

"At first they had sometimes ventured to lock up their house and make an excursion together into F——." (He named the adjoining market-town, which I will not further particularise.) "But by-and-bye they gave up such recklessness entirely, and whenever one of them went out, the other always remained on guard at home. The precaution was quite unnecessary. All the poor in the neighbourhood were by this time fully convinced that there was something 'unked' about them, and no one in R——, or for miles round, would have willingly crossed their threshold, even if the door had been left open. But these old misers were altogether too suspicious to reason, and seemed to live in an ever-increasing fear of having their privacy invaded.

"My uncle (as he himself told me shortly before his death) was greatly exercised about his two strange parishioners. Many rectors would have considered themselves absolved of all obligations towards people who not merely never attended church, but refused even to admit their clergyman into their house when he called. But that was not my uncle's way. Every poor man who lived in his parish he held to be under his pastoral protection; and he felt himself bound to look after his interests. In regard to these two old misers, however, it was difficult to know what was the kindest course. To let them live on in their present half-starved condition, and in that fearfully insanitary hovel, undisturbed, seemed no real kindness. And yet he was loth to set the parish or the sanitary officers upon their track. He held very strongly to the opinion that an Englishman's house—even if it be nothing better than a pig-sty—is his castle; and, in his heart, by no means approved of the wide compulsory powers then lately given to the local authorities.

"Besides, after all, what could such authorities do? Compel them to evacuate their miserable shanty, no doubt. But the old people would then simply change their local habitation, not their mode of life. And as regards starving themselves, not all the Boards of Guardians in Somerset could make people eat who did not choose to do so. It was possible, indeed, that they might be medically found of unsound mind; and, in that case, they could be removed to the workhouse infirmary or the county asylum. But even supposing that feasible, it was a course from which my uncle shrank. And the outcome of it all was that he let things remain in statu quo.

"When I succeeded him here, I went to call, now and then, on the old people; meeting, however, with the same treatment that my uncle had always experienced. Sometimes, they would not open the door at all; at others, they did so with the chain up, and conversed with me through a narrow aperture. In reply to my inquiries whether I could do anything, or give them any assistance, I always had a negative returned; until at last I gave up trying to make headway in so hopeless a direction, and left the two hermits pretty much to themselves.

"The man came to me regularly every half-year to get his pension papers signed; and I took advantage of these opportunities to give him some friendly advice, and to remonstrate with him on his folly in starving himself and wearing such inadequate clothing in the coldest weather. At first, I had made him a present of some old coats, trousers, and flannel shirts. But I soon gave up that, for he never wore them; and I formed the impression that he had probably converted them into cash. In fact, I asked him one day what he had done with them all. He only looked cunning, affected stupidity, and made some unintelligible signs. Despite his dumbness, he could make me understand things very well when he liked—especially anything connected with his pension papers. It was only when he did not wish to make himself understood that his signs had no meaning in them.

"In this matter of coming to have his papers signed, he was, as I have said, always absolutely punctual. On March 25 and September 29 he appeared at the rectory as regularly as clockwork, taking me on the way to F——, where he had to present his papers at the post-office. I always looked for him on the morning of those days, and always took the precaution to have my study windows wide open. The old man and water had long been mutual strangers, and the atmosphere which attended him was, to say the least, rather oppressive. When he was gone, I added to my disinfectant precautions with a strong pipe; and I can assure you that the foulest pipe in my rack d to be called into requisition. A sort of homœopathy, you see. However, this is by the way.

"He was always, as I have said, punctual in coming. And when one Michaelmas-day—it was just two years ago now—came and went without his putting in an appearance, I at once remarked it as a very noticeable circumstance. The next day I expected him—with opened windows—and the next, and the next; but he did not turn up. At length, after waiting a week, I felt sure that he must be ill, and went over to the shanty to inquire.

"I hammered at the door. Nobody answered. I hammered louder and louder, with the same result. In the end, as a last resort, I tried it. To my surprise, it was unfastened. I pushed it open and went in.

"I cannot tell you what my feelings were as I entered that miserable sty. A more dismal, forlorn, and withal filthy hovel has surely never been inhabited by human beings. There was scarcely any furniture. The walls were black and covered with cobwebs, and simply alive with creeping insects; and the floor—well, I won't attempt to describe it. I think you could have cut the atmosphere with a knife, so thick and foul it was; and fetid, oh, insufferably fetid. It nearly poisoned me, and my first impulse was to beat a hasty retreat into the open. But a low moan from the corner attracted me. I looked; and there I saw a sight at once loathsome and pitiable.

"Crouching against the wall, upon the damp and mouldy floor, was a figure covered with an old sack. I went nearer. At first I could not see which of the two it was. But, on looking more closely, I made it out to be the old woman. She was almost naked, except for the covering of the sack; and one of her yellow arms, which lay exposed, looked unspeakably lean and shrivelled and weird. I also noted another point. The tangled black hair, which had always struck me so about her, was now betrayed as not being her own. It was a wig; half on and half off at that moment, giving her a fearfully grotesque appearance, and clearly revealing her bald pate, scantily fringed with a few wisps of grey hair, beneath.

"'What is the matter? Are you ill?' I asked, bending down, and speaking in a loud, clear voice; for I knew her to be almost stone-deaf.

"She stared at me with dazed, suspicious eyes, but said nothing; only moaned again.

"'Are you ill?' I repeated.

"Another moan.

"'Where is your brother?' I shouted. 'Has he left you alone?'

"She looked hard at me. I could see in her restless black eyes that this time she had caught the purport of my question.

"'Brother Tom?' she muttered.

"'Yes!' I roared. 'Where is he?'

"She looked at me very cunningly. Her eyes seemed to wake up and sparkle with an almost unnatural brightness.

"'Don't you know?' she gasped.

"I shook my head.

"'Well, you shall hear,' she went on. 'I'm just going the same way myself, and it's no use keeping secrets any longer. He's dead.'

"'Dead!' I exclaimed, supposing that her wits were wandering, for I had seen him at his hovel door less than a fortnight since. 'When did he die?'

"She gave a low chuckle.

"'Fifteen year ago.'

"Now, of course, I saw that she was raving. Her hawk-like eyes, fixed on my face in a most forbidding leer, at once read my thoughts.

"'No, I ain't mad. It's the truth. He died fifteen year ago, and I buried him myself under yonder hearthstone. Get them to dig it up, and you'll find his bones.'

"As she spoke, the hag clutched my sleeve, and half raised herself by a supreme effort. Her face wore a fiendishly exultant grin. Her whole expression was grotesque and repulsive. She leered into my face with a look that I can never forget.

"'Yes, yes,' she said. 'All true—all true. I hid it, and no one knew. And,' with a hideous chuckle, 'I've dror'd his pension myself for fifteen year!'"

* * * * *

"And were her brother's bones found there?" I asked the Rector, in the course of a subsequent conversation on the subject.

"Yes. He had been buried scarcely a couple of feet below the surface. And in a hole in the chimney we found the miser's savings—more than £500 in gold and notes. It was paid over to Government, in return for the fifteen years' pension out of which they had been cheated."

"It was a wonder that no one found out the woman's dual personality."

"It was, indeed. But no one dreamed of suspecting. And the woman must have worked it very cunningly. The difference in her look with and without the black wig was quite remarkable. Then her brother's dumbness was a feature in her favour—no chance of being found out by the voice. Of course, to any one who had the smallest suspicion, the whole thing would soon have revealed itself as plain as a pikestaff. But no suspicion existing, I do not think that the real explanation was likely to cross any one's mind, and, as a matter of fact, it never did."

ART NOTES.

ARTS AND CRAFTS AT THE NEW GALLERY.

It is now several years since the members of the Arts and Crafts Society gave a public exhibition of their handiwork, but in the meantime, if one may judge by what is to be seen at the New Gallery, they have learned nothing and forgotten nothing. They still cling to those pre-Raphaelite forms and fashions which may be decorative, but are most decidedly uncomfortable, when applied to the uses of domesticity. For my own part, I must say that I do not care for high-art furniture. It may be all very well to look at in a museum, but who that appreciates cosiness and comfort would think of having it in one's own house? There are chairs at the New Gallery which give one the cramp to look at them. As well might one do a spell in "Little-Ease" at the Tower of London as elect to pass an evening in a full-blown "Arts and Crafts'" fauteuil. It is just the sort of chair to suit you if you habitually fall into the postures of the quaint angular figures in the Bayeux Tapestry and go through life in what Mr. W. S. Gilbert has called "stained-glass attitudes." But I should like to see an ordinary man trying to enjoy a cigar in Chair No. 207 in the catalogue, say, or taking his ease in Chimney-corner No. 294! It is possible that there may be those who can live up to such a household chattel as the iron four-poster exhibited by Mr. Robert Christie—which was happily dubbed "the ramrod bedstead" on press view day by one of the critics—but to the average spectator it appears about as inviting as an Inquisition rack, and not so well suited for a bedroom as for a torture-chamber. Look again at Mr. Bankart's "Larch Cradle" (No. 289), and you can scarcely fail to pity the child who is destined to be rocked in it, so cold, so bare, so uncomfortable does it look. On the other hand, it may be advisable to cradle the high-art infant thus; for this discipline in infancy may serve to prepare the æsthetic babe to sit later on with Spartan fortitude in those back-aching chairs and chimney-corners which seem to be de rigueur in the "Arts and Crafts'" household.

In addition to furniture, the "Arts-and-Craftsmen" exhibit paperhangings, dinner glass, gas-fittings, carpets, door knockers, books, tapestries, fenders, and many other kinds of domestic accessories, and in most of them the same fault is apparent. They may suit the faddish æstheticism of the few, but they do not satisfy the needs of the many, who would gladly welcome high art into their dwellings if it only adapted itself in a reasonable way to the manners and customs and requirements of the day. But it is futile to expect that the general public will buy books printed in such archaic type and with such an effusion of floreated borders and colophons that it is impossible to read what is in them; or that it will cover its walls with stiffly-posed figures of angular and emasculate knights and of sad-eyed, woebegone, and anæmic maidens; or that it will take kindly to sofas too decorative to lie on, and arm-chairs only fit to be exhibited as high-art curiosities in a glass-case at South Kensington. Decorative art has wandered too long in the pre-Raphaelite wilderness, and it is high time that it came out of that sterile waste, and made an effort to show that what is beautiful can be also appropriate to the age for which it is fashioned.

Perhaps the most important feature of the exhibition at the New Gallery is the specially gathered collection of drawings, studies, and paintings by the late Ford Madox Brown. These are to be seen on the walls of the South Gallery, and furnish a most interesting summary of the life work of a most sincere, though much misunderstood artist. Looking at his work thus collected, one is inclined to believe that Madox Brown was "born too late into too old a world." His personality was clearly not a nineteenth century one. His inspiration was derived from the Middle Ages, and one who knew him intimately has well said that "his mind was almost Chaucerian, and his work mirrored his mind." Most assuredly he is not everybody's artist; but it is impossible to look at his cartoons and paintings without being impressed with the sincerity and individuality with which he lived his life and did the work that he felt he had it in him to do.

MUSIC.

MR. LANSDOWNE COTTELL AGAIN.

I HAVE received some interesting correspondence and other particulars in regard to the London Conservatoire of Music and its director, Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, a subject which I mentioned a fortnight ago. It will be recollected that a gentleman whom I then called Colonel X. answered an advertisement as follows:—

Gentleman's Son required, just from school, of good address, and accomplished, to be trained to assist in private office and otherwise, a gentleman holding high, prominent position; board; progressive salary; moderate premium.—Letters M., 62, Queen's-road, Hyde Park.

The mysterious M. proved to be Mr. Lansdowne Cottell. "R.A.M., M.S.A.," (whatever those inititials may be worth), who, in reply to an application for particulars, stated he required "a young gentleman to train in my private office, in my mansion above," adding that "a salary no doubt can be fixed according to value of services," and referring casually to "a nominal premium." Of late there have been several advertisements of a similar character in the Standard and elsewhere, a fact which seems to show that "Gentlemen's Sons" are for this sort of work at a considerable, rather than a merely "nominal," premium.

A reader of TRUTH has, in a letter rather too long to quote in extenso, described how the thing is done. This gentleman—who, with greater courage than some other newspaper correspondents seem to pluck up, gives his full name as Mr. F. E. Wood, and his address—answered one of Mr. Lansdowne Cottell's attractive advertisements last June. I cannot print the whole of his letter, but some extracts will serve. Mr. Wood says:—

I happened to be in London shortly after writing to the "mansion above," and to my surprise I received a letter at my hotel, generously informing me that the lodge of 66, Porchester-road, Hyde Park, adjoined the Royal Oak Metropolitan Station, and that M. would be glad to meet me in view to arrangements, on Thursday, June 9, 11 to 1, or 3 to 8, at that address.

Mr. Wood goes on to say that, after several knockings, he was ushered into the drawing-room, and after waiting half-an-hour a gentleman whose fingers were covered with rings entered. Mr. Wood explained he had come according to the letter, and the gentleman, who it appeared was no other than Mr. Lansdowne Cottell himself, replied that the scholarship depended entirely upon the ability of the candidate. For many years I may remark that advertisements have appeared in the daily papers offering "free" scholarships at this London Conservatoire of Music. Of these I shall have to speak later on. Mr. Wood continues:—

I told him that I had called with reference to the secretaryship and not the scholarship. He then informed me that his present secretary was rather indolent, and that my work would be to assist in correspondence and teaching, and also to take his place when he was visiting the other centres. He said I should have to learn his system of tuition, and that he taught only his own compositions at the Conservatoire. I then sat at an Ascherberg grand pianoforte which had seen better days, and played, and also read some of his music, accompaniments, &c. He asked me questions on harmony. I, of course, wanted to know if there was any likelihood of our coming to terms, and he told me there was. I asked him what salary there was, and he coolly told me that for the first three months or so there would be none, though after that I should begin at about 10s. per day. But the first three months would be taken up in giving me the necessary "professional style" and getting me "into" the work. The usual fees for resident students were £130 per annum, but, as I had shown such conspicuous ability they would be lowered to £60. He also informed me that I should have the benefit of attending all his concerts and meeting all the first artists of the day, combined with board and a highly aristocratic home. I said I would think over it.

The fact that Mr. Cottell, though "holding high prominent position," expected his secretary to give music lessons was apparently not objected to by the applicant. This particular duty is, I believe, not usually considered secretarial work, although I have no doubt I could mention more than one private secretary who would prefer it to the routine of political correspondence, particularly if the secretary's tastes were musical, and his pupils were ladies, young and well-favoured. From the point of view of the luckless pupil thus condemned to be taught by the "Gentleman's Son just from school" it is doubtless altogether another matter. It is also, of course, quite another question for the "Gentleman" whose son was so fresh from school. But the whole thing is obviously a trick to get paying pupils. The "progressive salary," in fact, vanishes into the thin air of the distant future. The preliminary fee is the bone which Mr. Lansdowne Cottell chiefly desires to pick. The usual fee is £130, but "for you" it shall be £60: perhaps for no better reason than an American assigned to a Scotsman who desired an extra discount. At any rate, instead of a "moderate premium" for "board and progressive salary," the unfortunate applicant is coolly told that he must pay, like a pupil, at the rate of £60 a year for the first three months. What happens after the first quarter I am, of course, not aware. But by the very frequent advertisements for gentlemen's sons, "to train to assist in private office and otherwise a gentleman holding high prominent position," most of us, I suppose, can guess.

Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, however, had not yet done with Mr. F. E. Wood. Mr. Wood "thought of it," as he was bidden, and apparently thought very little of it, for he wisely dropped the whole affair. Mr. Cottell soon afterwards enclosed him a ticket for a concert given by a certain Signor Massimo Massimi, who was announced, I see, as "Tenor, Italian Opera, Covent Garden," but with whose name I regret I am unfamiliar. This concert was announced to be held in the "Salons" of the London Conservatoire of Music. "Programme, price 6d." which I see on the top of one of these documents, is, of course, a mere detail. Mr. Wood did not use the ticket, and shortly afterwards he received another letter, written on the back of an old programme, and reading as follows:—

July 20, 1896.

DEAR SIR,—I should be glad to know your decision now. I am filling all the vacancies, arranging salaries, &c. I rather expected to have seen you at the concert last Saturday.—Yours truly, LANSDOWNE COTTELL.

Still Mr. Wood, with true West Country caution, saved his postage-stamp and omitted to reply. He states:—

Shortly after this I received another letter (on the back of another old programme) informing me that if I would go the fee would be reduced to £30.

Not even this bait could catch the crafty fish from the West Countrie, and Mr. Lansdowne Cottell this time lost his £30. What Mr. Wood lost may be another matter.

I referred just now to the scholarships offered from time to time at the London Conservatoire. This little stroke of business is done sometimes by advertisement, sometimes, as I pointed out a fortnight ago, by circulars inviting "Ladies and Gentlemen to whom this form may be addressed" to become season-ticket holders, and to nominate "free" scholars. These season tickets nominally cost £10. 10s. a year, and entitle the holder to place two students gratuitously in the Conservatoire, or one student, who will be boarded and lodged gratuitously, "subject to the rules and regulations of the Conservatoire," whatever they may be. A "Special Private Notice" in blood-red ink was however a year or two ago circulated to the effect that "Ladies and Gentlemen to whom this form may be addressed" might have all these inestimable privileges at the ridiculously low rate of a guinea a year, or £5. 5s.

for life. As I intimated, there is no doubt a good deal of profit to be made out of free scholarships, when you know how to do it, and the modus operandi is disclosed to me by a gentleman who for obvious reasons does not desire his name to be mentioned, and to whom I therefore refer as Mr. F. This gentleman writes:—

With reference to your exposure of the London Conservatoire of Music, I state my experience with these people in case it may be of service to you. I called in answer to an advertisement for "amateur violinists, &c., to train for opera or concerts." On arriving at Porchester-road, the director, Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, heard me play, and said if I paid a guinea for a term's instruction I should then have two years' instruction free, subject to the rules and regulations. I enclose you the memorandum he wrote on an old envelope. After I had had a term, he gave me the form enclosed, and altered my ticket, as you see, to go on for another term.

The "form" in question is a printed document, announcing that "free instruction" is given in various subjects, that free students must attend regularly, take part in public or private performances when required, and pay 10 per cent. of any money derived from musical engagements for a period of two years. Then occurs this curious clause:—

All solo music necessary for study is supplied by the Conservatoire; but free students must defray the expense of the same by a half-yearly subscription of one guinea to the library, payable in advance.

Thus this unfortunate man was asked to pay a guinea for a term's "free" instruction and a guinea per half-year subscription to the library, plus 10 per cent. on engagements. The card which was given him as a sort of receipt for his money is now before me. It bears the curious inscription "London Conservatoire of Music Continental Solo Class." What may be a "Continental Solo" is a puzzle which Mr. Lansdowne Cottell alone can unravel. To resume Mr. F.'s narrative:—

The point I wish to draw attention to is the fact of not receiving this agreement until after having parted with a guinea. If I had seen it beforehand, I should never have gone in for it, as, reckoning four terms in a year, that would mean paying eight guineas for two years' tuition in the ordinary way, whereas, for "free" tuition I pay a guinea for the first term, plus four guineas to the library, and agree to give 10 per cent. of my earnings for two years. I would prefer paying for tuition.

Mr. F. continues at great length concerning some lessons which he alleges he had not had, owing to the fact that they clashed with the holidays. But the matter has little or nothing to do with the point in question, so I shall not deal with it.

The trick in these two cases seems to be identical. The bait is "free" tuition, or in the case of secretaryships "board and progressive salary." Instead, the candidate is told that he is not good enough yet, and therefore must have some preliminary training, and pay for it. Fees are supposed to be reduced, and when the gudgeon fails to bite, are further reduced—apparently upon the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread. But the idea is always the same, to secure some sort of payment for this alleged preliminary training, after which any man with a knowledge of the world may imagine what is likely to happen. The case of Mr. Wood is a particularly flagrant one. I should like to know what Mr. Lansdowne Cottell has to say about it, and also to hear from any of his pupils, or former secretaries, as to their experiences. I should also like to learn what the Duchess of Wellington, the Countess of Strafford, Lord and Lady Carrington, Sir W. T. Marriott, Canon Harford, Dr. Spark, and other ladies and gentlemen, whose names are in the circular before me lumped together as "Committee, Patrons, and Subscribers to the Concerts," think of Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, his Conservatoire, and the use made of their names.

The Crystal Palace Concerts started on Saturday, a full fortnight earlier than usual. The idea, of course, is to get a dozen of the twenty performances over before Christmas, so as to avoid the loss involved in concert-giving in the Sydenham suburbs after Easter. To my mind the better plan would have been to cut off four concerts and improve the programmes.

A nonsensical pamphlet has, by the way, been issued by somebody from the Crystal Palace Press threatening the discontinuance of the concerts unless they are better patronised. But considering the great competition in town—upwards of sixty symphony concerts are announced in the Metropolis before Christmas—strong programmes and fewer, though first-rate, performances are the chief essentials. To talk about the discontinuance of Saturday concerts is nonsense. They never did pay their way, and never were expected to. But they have always proved a valuable advertisement. They are an attraction to the Palace in the same sense that the unremunerative skating-rink and the Alhambra Court might be, and also they keep together the permanent orchestra, which plays daily at a salary which the members would not accept if the Saturday performances were abolished. The concert receipts have, I believe, fallen off only since the half-crown promenades were abolished, and season-ticket holders were charged extra for admission to the concert-room. If, as I gather from the official journal of the Orchestral Association, the famous orchestra is now to be reduced for the sake of saving a few pounds, the step may prove a very serious one to the Crystal Palace. This, when the late Weist Hill resigned his bâton owing to similar "economies," was the beginning of the end of the Alexandra Palace. In regard to last Saturday's programme, I am bound, however, to say that the orchestra was kept up to its full strength of ninety players, and that, apart from a certain occasional coarseness, the band was quite equal to its usual form. The chief novelty, a violoncello concerto by Herr Klughardt, of Dessau, however, proved to be an uninteresting work, the slow movement of which was the best.

The Sunday Concerts have indisputably injured the more expensive symphony concerts, for at marvellously cheap prices (from 3d. to 2s.) they give symphony performances with a good orchestra in the heart of London. It is true the thing is done by inducing the band to take reduced fees on the principle that they have no rehearsals; but to a certain section of the public the work of proper preparation apparently does not matter. Now, however, the competition is to be extended to every Saturday night during the winter, when Promenade Concerts, with "symphony" first parts of the programmes, are to take place at Queen's Hall. On Saturday nights, as a rule, London concert halls are closed, but Promenade Concerts always have flourished on that evening.

A delightful suggestion has been made by a professional musical paper that members of the Royal College of Organists should wear some distinctive-coloured tie. They have a hood and gown to wear indoors, at church, or wheresoever the spirit may move them, but some of the dressy members, it seems, hanker after a sort of undress uniform, and a particular coloured tie appears to hit the mark. It is only fair to add that this ridiculous proposal has been laughed out of argument by the majority of members, though if any youth of the R.C.O. wishes, for the benefit of the ladies in general, or of any lady in particular, to disport himself in Hyde Park in a hood of cerulean blue silk, lined with satin, there is no earthly reason why he should not do so.

It appears that there was a loss at the last Gloucester Festival of about £600; but, instead of calling upon the guarantors, the Stewards very wisely and properly took the amount out of the funds subscribed to the charity. They themselves were the largest subscribers, and why they should be expected twice to dip their hands into their pockets is not exactly clear. It will be interesting to know what course will be adopted by the stewards of the recent Festival at Worcester.

The Norwich Festival rehearsals have been going on from Thursday last week until Tuesday this. I must speak of the Festival next week, but whatever may be the artistic result, Mr. Randegger, the conductor, hardly had a fair chance. His friend Signor Mancinelli, for his "Hero and Leander," took from eleven to four of Monday, the only day allotted to full rehearsals, and Mr. Randegger was expected to prepare the whole of the rest of the Festival in the remaining four hours. The Festival will be a financial success; though no one will be astonished to learn that the largest number of tickets have been sold for the performance at which the Prince of Wales and the Duke and Duchess of York will be present. The audience will hear "The Rose of Sharon," but the city of mustard and boots, of starch and serge, will, of course, turn out wholly and solely to welcome the Prince. Royalty at a Festival is a sure draw.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—I'm sorry that collars are to be so fearfully high again this winter. It gives such a choky look to so many women as to be quite distressing. Those with short necks when wearing them have to twist their heads round in a way that almost makes their eyes protrude when they wish to take a side view of things in general. And, after all, we seldom have such bitterly cold weather as to make these dread-nought defences really necessary.

The Queen, when giving permission for high bodices to be worn at her Majesty's Drawing Rooms on special application, worded it so that the "aged or infirm" were supposed to be the only privileged persons. I have always understood that, since then, there has been a wonderful falling off in the number of high bodices worn at Drawing Rooms. Perhaps if it were supposed that only the aged or infirm were to patronise high collars they would soon fall into desuetude.

I saw a sweet costume in Bond-street on Saturday, and yet it was simplicity itself. Black serge skirt. Bodice to match, with a black velvet vest, fastenings invisible. Black velvet collar, with a little old, creamy lace hanging out over it at the sides and back. Cherry-coloured velvet hat with white and black wings (pigeons') round the full crown. A most covetable little cape of dark blue cloth, with rows of stitching for sole finish, hung on the arm.

The black velvet vest was most becoming!

The Trocadéro, once a music-hall, is now opened as a restaurant, and we were among several hundreds invited on Saturday to inspect the magnificent decorations. The place is a dream of colour—a real feast to the eyes. I cannot describe the various rooms in detail. It would not interest you, and it would unduly tax my powers; but I should like you to see the wonderful frieze that runs round the entrance hall. I thought at first that it was a mosaic of coloured marbles, but found afterwards that the material is fibrous plaster modelled in relief, and enriched with bright colours and metals. The subject of the design is the Arthurian legend.

The grand restaurant is on the ground floor—a very fine room, with its sumptuous Eastern carpets and a gold gallery, one end of which, on Saturday, was occupied by a band. A Masonic Lodge with ante room is one of the features. The staircase down to the grill-room is lined with grey-green marble, white and light, looking like photographs of the sea on a bright, sunny, windy day. The grill is similar to the one in the House of Commons.

Cream colour and gold are the prevailing tints in the grand restaurant, the walls being panelled with English brocades from the looms at Spitalfields. Crimson draperies are, as you may imagine, highly effective against this background. We saw the great banqueting-room upstairs—what a dance one could have there!—and ascended even to the kitchens, which are at the top of the house, and where half-a-dozen chefs of various departments work in silence. Orders are transmitted without speech, the business of cookery being regarded as being too important for interruption. "Do not talk to the man at the wheel." That kind of thing, you know.

The orange globes of the electric light, and the beautiful flower decorations, consisting of Cape gooseberries arranged in hundreds of chalet-roofed rustic baskets, gave an Eastern look to all the rooms. What interested Richard very much was the new idea of having a table d'hôte wine list, and thus saving the guest the trouble of selecting his own wine. It accompanies the viands as a matter of course. For instance, the 3s. 6d. table d'hôte wine list allows each customer a glass of sherry, one of hock or claret, two of champagne, and a liqueur or old brandy with the coffee. For more money the wines will be of superior quality, and at the highest rate dessert claret and milk punch are thrown in.

Women ought to be all in favour of this new arrangement, as it tends to moderation in the consumption of wine. "May as well finish the bottle" has accounted for many a muddled brain.

What scenes the vestries of some of our churches witness! If any one had looked into one of them the other morning he would have seen a young man raging and almost tearing his hair, striding up and down the room, and using language that, though it may have been strictly ecclesiastical, was anything but saintly. It seems that at one or two churches in the West End a simple declaration of age on the part of the bride or her relatives is not accepted as sufficient. The register of her birth is required. For obvious reasons I suppress the names of these churches, for if you were to allow them to get abroad, the number of marriages at them would be very considerably reduced! Brides who had impressed their lovers with the idea that their age was—say nineteen—would avoid with extreme care a church which insisted on the production of documentary evidence to the effect that their summers amounted to twenty-six or twenty-seven.

The young man whose agitation I have been endeavouring to describe to you had wooed and won a bride, believing her to be just "sweet and twenty." The vestry clerk, well accustomed to the duty of enlightening prospective bridegrooms on the point, laid the copy of the certificate of baptism before him without a word—"Born March 16, 1867." He read it out with an upward, astonished rush of voice that ended in a sort of scream. He himself is just twenty-three, and had often dilated on the suitability of age between himself and his intended wife to certain friends who viewed the match with some disfavour.

What can a man do in such circumstances as these? If he is not very much in love, his first impulse is to tax the girl with deception and break off the match. But if he is a gentleman, he reflects that to do so would put her in a terrible position, and he can't bring himself to do that. Some of these disagreeably-surprised bridegrooms go straight to the fiancée's mother and give her an uncomfortable quarter of an hour. The mother is usually in the deception, you know, and has her falsified dates so pat as to be quite convincing should any small doubts have arisen on the question.

Girls whose names are in the Peerage cannot do much in the way of concealing their real age. Burke is too polite to give particulars, but Lodge goes into detail on these delicate points. Were it not for that, there might be considerable misrepresentation, successful too, for the open-air life led by girls and women nowadays conduces to clearness of complexion and the retention of youthful looks.

And what of the young man of whose particular case I have been telling you? I'm sure you want to know. Well, I'll tell you some day. Things are effervescent just at present.

You see, Amy, it is not only the disappointment of finding the girl ever so much older than was imagined, but there is the fact of discovering her to be insincere. It is not considered much of a fib, perhaps, to make oneself out younger than one's years, but if there is any true love in the matter it banishes falsehood. A girl who can deliberately tell untruths about her age will not find much difficulty in telling them about other things. Will she?

Madame Bluette has returned from Paris to 41, Green-street, Park-lane, with the latest fashions in millinery. You remember she sells hats and bonnets at 15s. each, well up-to-date in style. In fact, she may be called a reformer, for the prices of headgear are really terrible, as a rule.

Do you like geese? Try one this way:—

Remove the wings from a goose, which is ready dressed for the spit, then press into shape. Mince the liver (from which the gall has been removed) with 2 oz. of bacon, 2 mushrooms, and 1 oz. of truffles. Season with pepper, salt, and the leaves picked from a sprig of sweet lemon thyme. Dust in a little grated nutmeg. Add a lump of butter as big as a walnut; then mix altogether. With this stuff the body of the goose. Secure the ends safely, so that the stuffing may not escape. Set the bird before the fire, and well baste. When the goose is nearly cooked strew it all over with fine, well-spiced, bread-crumbs, and leave to brown. In the meantime, skin and mince a dozen shalots, put them into a stewpan with a gill of good stock. Season with pepper and salt. Then add a tablespoonful of ham cullis and the juice of a lemon. Let the whole boil one moment, then pour all on to the dish, lay the goose in the centre and serve. The French generally remove the wings from a goose before cooking, and reserve them for other purposes.

Legs of geese are excellent broiled like beef bones for breakfast:—

Place the goose legs in a jar. Covered entirely with fat, they will then keep any length of time. When required to eat, slightly fry them, to melt the fat, then dust well with cayenne, and set them on a gridiron over a clear fire. When broiled, arrange on a hot dish, squeezing over the juice of a lemon. Garnish with small cress. Serve very hot.

Soles, with sauce as follows, are to be recommended:—

Scale, draw, wash, and wipe the soles quite dry. Fry them to a brown colour. When done, drain. Now make sufficient stuffing to fill the number of soles required. Chop finely green onions, parsley, capers, and anchovies separately. Open, and bone the soles without disfiguring the fish. Dust over each pepper and salt. Then cover one half with the forcemeat. Brush over a little heated butter, and put the two halves together again. Arrange the fish on a buttered dish. Let all stew for ten minutes. When ready, squeeze over them the juice of an orange. Serve the soles in the same dish in which they were cooked.

HALF A DOZEN TRANSGRESSIONS.

By HÉLÈNE GINGOLD.

PRICE THREE SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE.

"It is not too much to say that in the six short stories in this book Miss Gingold has shown herself a literary artist of the first rank. Her plots are strange, sometimes grotesque, with strange situations, and endings that come as a surprise. Her views of human nature are somewhat cynical, her philosophy a laughing one, her humour veiled satire, set out in piquant and fascinating phrases. . . . It is a book that will make all who can appreciate good work sorry when the end of it is reached."—Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.

J. M. DENT & CO.'S NEW NOVELS.

NEW ROMANCE BY H. G. WELLS.

THE WHEELS OF CHANCE: A Cycling Romance. By H. G. WELLS. With about 40 illustrations by J. Ayton Symington. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR. THIRD EDITION.

THE WONDERFUL VISIT. By H. G. WELLS, author of "The Time Machine," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 5s. net.

"Enthusiastic we own that we are; no book could be more prodigal of honest delight, and its promise leaves hardly any literary accomplishment beyond the aspiration of its author."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"It would be indeed difficult to overpraise the grace, the delicacy, and the humour with which the author has accomplished his task. It is all so piquantly fresh, so charmingly unconventional, that it carries one away with it from start to finish in a glow of pleasurable sentiment. Rarely, amidst all the floods of conventional fiction-spinning and latter-day psychological analysis, does one come across such a pure jet of romantic fancy as that with which Mr. Wells refreshes our spirits. It is like a spring of fresh water hidden amongst the bracken, a green and waving oasis in the parched and interminable desert."—W. L. COURTNEY in The Daily Telegraph.

THE TOUCH OF SORROW. By EDITH HAMLET (the Hon. Mrs. Alfred Lyttelton). A Study. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Spectator.—"The principal characters are imagined with insight drawn with true art."

Daily Telegraph.—"Miss Hamlet's powerful story."

Guardian.—"Stella Morecombe is one of these rare heroines whose charm is felt by the reader as well as described by the writer."

IN THE VALLEY OF TOPHET. By H. W. NEVINSON. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Nevinson's keenness and clearness of observation of his characters come of his deep sympathy with them. Through the mirk and the mire, the folly, the ignorance, and the superstition, he sees the good human stuff. Hence his humour has always in it something of pathos, and his pathos is just lightened by a touch of humour. He plumbs profound depths. He not infrequently brings a lump in the throat."—Daily Chronicle.

DR. VERMONT'S FANTASY, and other Stories. By HANNAH LYNCH. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"Miss Lynch has proved in previous work that she has at command the most precious of gifts, the gift of charm. These stories are all more or less interpenetrated by it. Nor is the working of it in us merely while we read. It recurs unbidden in the 'sessions of sweet silent thought.'"—Daily Chronicle.

IN THE HEART OF THE HILLS. A NEW England Story. By SHERWIN CODY. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"It gives the most comprehensive picture of country life in New England that has yet been made. The sentiment of the book is delicate and charming."—Vanity Fair.

IN THE WAKE OF KING JAMES; or Dun-randal on the Sea. A New Historical Romance. By STANDISH O'GRADY Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"No one now living writes a better story of adventure than Mr. Standish O'Grady. . . . 'In the Wake of King James' ought to be devoured for pure delight by all the young people in the Kingdom."—Athenæum.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S NEW NOVEL.

At all Booksellers' and Newsagents, crown 8vo, 6s.

SIR GEORGE TRESSADY

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD,

Author of "Robert Elsmere," "The History of David Grieve," "Marcella," &c.

From the Westminster Gazette:—"Mrs. Humphry Ward's latest novel is in many respects the best work that she has written. From first to last it is a novel of striking power, written with remarkable insight, delicacy, and restraint, and handled, especially in the opening and closing chapters, with a touch that only great artists of literature possess."

London: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15, Waterloo-place, S.W.

In 2 vols. with 2 Portraits and 2 Maps, demy 8vo, 28s.

THE MEMOIRS OF BARON THIEBAULT

(LATE LIEUTENANT-GENERAL IN THE FRENCH ARMY).

With Recollections of the Republic, the Consulate, and the Empire.

Translated and Condensed by A. J. BUTLER, M.A., Translator of the "Memoirs of Marbot."

From the Standard:—"Memoirs of the Napoleonic era have appeared of late in somewhat excessive quantity, but few, if any, of the more recent contributions to the personal history of that period have possessed the vividness of this biography. . . . Indeed, there is hardly a page in the two volumes which has not its value alike for the historian and the social student."

MERE STORIES.

By Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD.

"Mrs. W. K. Clifford's 'Mere Stories' is not only notable for the excellence and uniform interest of the stories it contains, but also for the novelty of its shape—that of the yellow French novel pure and simple. The innovation deserves encouragement. You do not want, at this time of day, an introduction to Mrs. Clifford's many good qualities. She has become one of those few writers of English fiction no one of whose books one can afford to leave unread."—Review of Reviews.

SATURDAY NEXT.

MAPLEDURHAM-ON-THAMES.

Notice of Sale of THE WARREN ESTATE.

MESSRS. SIMMONS & SONS are favoured with instructions to SELL by AUCTION on SATURDAY next, OCTOBER 10th, 1896, at TWO o'clock p.m. (weather permitting), in a large MARQUEE on the estate, or if weather unfavourable at the boathouse of the Caversham Bridge (Bona's) Hotel,

86 MAGNIFICENT SITES,

110 ACRES,

Above and below "The Warren," with attractive Thames-side Frontages extending to half-a-mile, commanding the choicest river scenery, and within easy access of the important Reading Railway Stations.

This Property forms one of the most picturesque and valuable portions of the celebrated Mapledurham Estate, so long connected with the Blount family. It occupies a most commanding position on the banks of, and overlooking the Thames, and affords very extensive views of the picturesque river and landscape scenery, for which the neighbourhood of Tilehurst and Mapledurham is so justly renowned.

"The Warren," from which the Property now takes its name, is well-known as one of the loveliest spots in the Thames Valley. Through it extends the private carriage-way to Mapledurham House, to which many of the Lots have frontages. Below it the grass slopes extend to the river bank, providing the choicest sites for bungalows and boathouses, while above it overhangs the beautifully wooded cliff on the summit of which some of the grandest sites imaginable for the erection of first-class residences are to be found, to which an excellent approach will now be provided by the construction of the new roadway to be known as Upper Warren Avenue, the gradient in which will in no part exceed one in twelve.

Many of these grand sites have important river frontages allotted to them, and their equal for beauty, compactness, and convenience of position is not to be found in the whole length of the Thames Valley.

The important railway stations of Reading are within ten minutes' drive, whence London is reached in forty-five minutes.

The upper part of the property is divided into smaller choice residential sites, each of which possesses easy access to the river, with a right of way to the Estate landing place, which will be expressly reserved for purchasers of this property in a central and picturesque portion of the river frontage of the Estate as shown on the plan.

Two important residences, one above the Warren and another on the river bank, and also a picturesque boathouse and boat and summer-house have been erected in recent years on this estate, and afford an excellent illustration of the beauty of the land as residential sites.

The estate is situate in the parishes of Mapledurham and Caversham, in the county of Oxford.

A lunch will be provided at Bona's Hotel, at one o'clock. A steam launch will leave East's boathouse (by Caversham Lock) at 12.45 to convey purchasers to the luncheon and sale tent. Luncheon tickets to be obtained on application to the Auctioneers only.

Illustrated particulars, plans, and conditions of sale, may be obtained of C. E. HEWETT, Esq., Solicitor, Friar-street, Reading; or of the Auctioneers, Henley-on-Thames, Reading, and Basingstoke.

PEEBLESSHIRE.

ESTATE OF PORTMORE.

For SALE by SEALED TENDER Above £87,000.

Tenders to be lodged on or before WEDNESDAY, 28th OCTOBER, 1896, at 12 o'clock Noon.

THIS MAGNIFICENT RESIDENTIAL AND SPORTING ESTATE is situated only 18 miles from Edinburgh and 6 from Peebles, and within 2 of Eddleston Station.

The MANSION commands extensive and lovely views of the Eddleston Valley and the Peeblesshire Hills. It contains 19 Bed-rooms and Dressing-rooms, 5 Reception Rooms, spacious corridors, and suitable servants' apartments. There are excellent Stable Offices, good Gardens with Hothouses and Vineries, and other suitable buildings and appointments.

The ESTATE extends to about 9,600 Acres, of which about 800 are Woodlands. The remainder is chiefly Arable and Pasture Land of high quality, let at moderate rents. Most of the Farms carry Sheep Stock of an excellent class and recognised character.

The SHOOTINGS are well mixed, affording ample sport. There is TROUT FISHING on the Streams, and the FISHING in PORTMORE LOCH (a charming sheet of water, 2 miles in circumference) could be vastly improved if stocked with Loch Leven trout.

RENTAL (exclusive of the Mansion and the principal Shootings), £3,092. 12s.

Conditions of tendering may be learned on application to Messrs. DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S., 16, St. Andrew-square, Edinburgh, who hold the Titles, and with whom the Tenders are to be lodged, and Messrs. BLACKWOOD & SMITH, Writers, Peebles, will, on receiving notice, arrange with those desirous to view the Estate.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

HOW TO MAKE AN INCOME-PAYING HOME.

The object of the above Company is to develop the resources of their estate, consisting of about 12,000 acres, situated in the far-famed Tulbagh district in the Western Province of Cape Colony, about 75 miles distant by rail from Cape Town. They are promoting the establishment of a successful colony. The estate has been surveyed and laid out in blocks of about 40 acres each, a number of which have already been sold. The purchase price of this land this year (with all water facilities) is £12 per acre, threequarters of which can remain bearing interest at six per cent. per annum.

In order to provide for the success of every colonist who has sufficient capital at command to be able to enter into this business, but has no practical knowledge of the work, the company have engaged the services of an efficient manager and a skilled horticulturist; and who will, if desired, plant, cultivate, and attend to the development of each client's farm for one year or more.

Thus any settler, provided he gives ordinary attention to the details of the work this company have undertaken for him, can obtain, under the guidance of a skilled specialist, that practical knowledge which is essential in the working to the best advantage of dairy and fruit farms.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

The Company undertake, if desired, to clear, plant, fence, supervise, and generally manage any holding. They guarantee that 90 per cent. of the trees and vines planted under the supervision of their staff grow to maturity, as specified in the agreement, a copy of which can be obtained on application. The company will manage the estate of any absentee at a charge of £1 a year per acre, and will also undertake to erect on the estate any houses for the residence of a settler, which can be chosen in London before sailing, with estimates given. They further undertake to purchase from a settler, at marketable prices, any approved dairy, farm, and orchard produce.

At the company's headquarters, at Seven Fountains, are the orchard and vineyard belonging to the company, and extensive creameries, packing houses, &c., will be erected as soon as necessary.

Steps are already being taken for the erection of a sugar beet factory, &c., and it is the intention of the company to promote milling and other industries.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

The Company solicit enquiries from families who are seeking a fresh start in life.

Young gentlemen who are looking for an opening in which to make their way.

Farmers who for years have been losing money in this country and would like to start afresh.

Retired members of the Military, Naval, and Civil Services, desiring to increase their incomes.

The delicate (those inclined to bronchial and pulmonary troubles) who need an avenue for making an income in a congenial climate.

The General Manager of the Company is going out at the beginning of October, and will be pleased to have the Company of any one who desires to avail himself of this opportunity of a fresh start in life in a new field.

All are requested to be good enough to place themselves in communication with the Secretary of the Company—

from whom full particulars and papers on all points can be obtained. Also the illustrated book on the subject, price 2s., together with a Manual of Practical Orchard Work at the Cape. Published by the Department of Agriculture of the Cape of Good Hope.

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.
(TEA-LIKE.)

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely-flavoured powder—"Cocoaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system.

VAN STEEN'S PEPTONISED ABSOLUTE SOLUBLE COCOA.

Delicious and Nutritive . . .

The ingredients added to this "Pure Cocoa" are harmless, and so small in quantity that the taste is quite disguised, at the same time the process of peptonising is perfect.

The nutritive value of this Cocoa in conjunction with the quickness with which it is assimilated renders it of the greatest value to the chronic dyspeptic and the sufferer from the excess of uric acid, thus placing it in the highest rank of foods suited to those with enfeebled digestive organs and kindred ailments.

This Peptonised Cocoa agrees with everybody even when ordinary cocoa disagrees.

PROSPECTUS.

This Corporation has been established with the power to undertake all kinds of insurance business (except "life").

Fire insurance business at the present time is practically a gigantic monopoly in the hands of a comparatively small number of offices ruled by what is known as the "Tariff Committee."

This Committee arbitrarily fixes the amount of premium payable on each respective class of risk, without allowing each case to be dealt with on its individual merits, thus making the good risks pay for the bad ones.

The necessity for offices which will act independently of the tariff companies is strongly felt, as owing to the want of such an institution these companies have been enabled to greatly raise their rates and still further to augment their profits.

There is a strong feeling against the recent heavy increase in the rates charged by the companies working under the Tariff Committee. Investors can satisfy themselves that such rates are unwarranted by reference to the published accounts for the past eight years of the different offices in the "Insurance Directory Reference and Year Book for 1896."

It is therefore clear that the time is most opportune for the establishment of this Corporation, which will act independently, and it is confidently expected that the insuring public will largely avail themselves of the favourable rates and increased facilities which this Corporation will be prepared to offer them, and that a substantial and very remunerative business will be secured.

The Directors are of opinion that the following advantages can with prudence and safety be held out to insurers, which advantages will form the leading features of the Corporation, viz.:—

(a) The rating of each risk upon its own individual merits, which is impossible when working under a tariff.
(b) The issue of policies on non-hazardous property, renewable each sixth year free of cost, provided no loss has occurred in the preceding five years.

Since 1886, insurance offices have decreased in number, owing to amalgamations, while the value of insurable property has enormously increased. In London alone £763,347,236 was written by sixty-nine companies in 1887, while in 1894, although the number of companies had decreased by amalgamation to fifty-nine, the amount written had risen to no less a sum than £845,998,895.

It is a well-known fact that insurance companies are amongst the most successful of commercial enterprises, and the high premiums at which fire insurance shares stand at the present time is an absolute proof of the appreciation by the investing public of this class of security.

Applicants for shares are requested to note and compare the present value of insurance shares as shown in the following table, which is taken from the "Insurance Blue Book and Guide" for 1896 and 1897, and the Directors have every reason to believe that the shares of this Corporation will prove equally valuable.

Company.	Nom. Am. each Share.	Paid up in Cash each Share.	Dividend last Financial Year.	Latest Buyers price each Share.
1. Atlas	50	5 0 0	22 per cent.	27 0 0
2. Kent	50	12 10 0	65 per cent.	215 0 0
3. Law	100	2 10 0	35 per cent.	15 10 0
4. Liverpool, London, and Globe	20	2 0 0	80 per cent.	54 0 0
5. Law Union and Crown	10	0 10 0	45 per cent.	6 15 0
6. London and Lancashire	25	2 10 0	20 per cent.	18 5 0
7. Northern	100	5 0 0	45 per cent.	77 0 0
8. Norwich Union	100	6 0 0	65 per cent.	124 0 0
9. Royal	20	2 0 0	86 per cent.	54 0 0

It is anticipated that the income from the first year's premiums will not be less than £50,000, and this should show a profit sufficient to pay a satisfactory dividend, after setting aside a substantial sum for the reserve fund.

The writing of carefully selected fire risks is the most profitable branch of insurance business, and the returns of the existing companies are constantly and rapidly increasing.

The issue of the shares of this Corporation at a premium protects the whole capital of the Corporation, and thus affords an opportunity of creating a substantial reserve fund.

The head offices will be in London, and it is intended to immediately open offices in Birmingham, Bristol, Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Cardiff, Newcastle, Glasgow, and at such other places as the Directors may determine upon.

The shareholders' liability is limited to the amount of their shares.

The following contracts have been entered into:—

A contract dated the 12th day of August, 1896, between Thomas Gray Parkinson of the one part, and Cecil Wagner Holmes of the other part, whereby Thomas Gray Parkinson, manager at Birmingham for the Kent Insurance Company, one of the wealthiest and most successful offices, has agreed to take and pay for in full, two hundred shares of £5 each in the Corporation, and to serve the Corporation for a period of five years as their general manager and secretary, thereby assuring an immediate and valuable connection.

A contract dated the 12th day of August, 1896, between Charles Cottrell for and on behalf of the Corporation of the one part, and Cecil Wagner Holmes of the other part, under which the said Cecil Wagner Holmes undertakes to pay the charges and expenses incidental to the formation and establishment of the Company up to and including allotment, and guarantees that 20,000 shares shall be subscribed for, on the terms of the prospectus, by responsible persons.

The above-mentioned contracts, together with the memorandum and articles of association of the Corporation may be inspected at the office of the solicitors of the Corporation, and applicants will be deemed to have had notice of the terms of the said contract, and to accept allotment on that footing.

In addition to the contracts already referred to, there are agreements and arrangements with other parties relating to the formation and working of the Corporation, and to the subscription of a portion of its capital, and otherwise, to which the Corporation are not a party, but which may constitute contracts within the meaning of Section 38 of the Companies Acts, 1867.

Applicants for Shares will be deemed to have full notice of such contracts and agreements, and to have waived their right to any particulars thereof, and to accept the above as a sufficient compliance with Section 38.

Applications for Shares should be made on the form enclosed, and sent with the deposit direct to the Corporation's bankers. In any case where no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full, and should the number of Shares allotted be less than the number applied for the surplus deposit will be applied towards the amount payable on allotment. Application will be made forthwith for a Stock Exchange settlement and quotation of the Corporation Shares.

Copies of the prospectus can be obtained at the offices of the Corporation, also from the bankers or brokers to the Corporation. Copies of the prospectus, memorandum and articles of association, and the agreements specified above can be seen at the offices of the solicitors to the Corporation.

October 5, 1896.

THE NEW BEESTON BREWERY COMPANY, Limited.

Incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890. Share Capital £280,000, divided into

28,000 Five-and-a-Half per Cent. Cumulative Preference Shares of £5 each	£140,000
28,000 Ordinary Shares of £5 each	140,000
	£280,000

In addition to which it is proposed to issue £140,000 Mortgage Debenture Stock bearing interest at the rate of Four per Cent. per annum. Power is reserved under the Trust Deed to make a further issue of £60,000, ranking pari passu with the present issue, for the purposes and on the conditions below mentioned.

The Debenture Stock will be redeemable on, or at any time after, 30th September, 1916, at the Company's option, on six months' notice being given, at the price of 110 per cent. It will (subject to an existing mortgage for £25,000, which, by the terms of the Mortgage Deed, cannot be repaid until the year 1905) be secured by a specific mortgage to the Trustees of the freehold and leasehold properties of the Company, and by a floating charge on the undertakings of the Company.

The unissued balance of £60,000 of Debenture Stock will only be issued for the purpose of paying off the mortgage referred to of £25,000, or for the purchase of additional properties, which will be included in the Trust Deed, and of the purchase price of such additional properties not less than two-fifths must be contributed out of funds other than the proceeds of the Debenture Stock.

Of the present issue, the Vendor takes in part payment of the purchase money £30,000 of the Debenture Stock, £30,000 of the Preference Shares, and £30,000 of the Ordinary Shares, leaving:—

£110,000 in Debenture Stock, £110,000 in Preference Shares, £110,000 in Ordinary Shares, which are now OFFERED for PUBLIC SUBSCRIPTION: the Debenture Stock at 103 per cent., and the Preference and Ordinary Shares at par. The instalments will be payable as follows:—

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed to acquire, carry on, and develop the business and the licensed houses, and other assets of the Beeston Brewery Company, Limited (which has a most successful trading record), and also to acquire the ownership of certain licensed houses, which have heretofore been supplied with beers from the brewery, under agreement.

The brewery is situated on a freehold plot of land immediately contiguous to the Beeston Station of the Midland Railway, to which it has a siding, thus enabling the beer to be easily and cheaply forwarded to Derby, Leicester, and the other important centres in the district. The town of Nottingham being only three miles from the brewery, the beer is sent there by dray. The water used is that of the Trent Valley, obtained from artesian wells on the Company's premises, and is similar to that used by the Burton brewers. The buildings are of modern structure, and well equipped with approved machinery and appliances, including pneumatic maltings, which are capable of making all the malt required by the brewery. Extensions (which are almost completed), for which the Vendor will pay, are being made to meet the rapidly increasing trade of the concern, and there is room for further expansion.

The brewery and other properties to be acquired by the Company have been valued by Messrs. Mason & Son, the well known brewery valuers, at £214,483, and the stocks, cash in hand, &c. amount to £28,000—making a total of £240,483.

The books and accounts have been examined by Messrs. Deloitte, Dever, Griffiths, and Co., who certify as follows:—

"4, Lothbury, London, E.C., September 19th, 1896.

"To the Directors of the New Beeston Brewery Company, Limited.

"Gentlemen,—We have examined the books and accounts of the Beeston Brewery Company, Limited, at Beeston, near Nottingham, for the four years ending March, 1896; also the books and accounts of Mr. S. T. Bunning, whose licensed houses, &c., have heretofore been supplied with beer from the brewery, for the four years ending December 31st, 1895.

"After writing back all interest, which the capital of the new Company will render unnecessary, Directors' fees, income-tax, and Mr. Bunning's salary, but making due provision for depreciation and bad and doubtful debts, the combined profits (bearing in mind the fact that the Brewery year ends in March, and Mr. Bunning's year in December) were:—

For the year	1892 —	1893	13,755	2	0
do.	1893 —	1894	18,279	3	10
do.	1894 —	1895	23,771	8	10
do.	1895 —	1896	31,123	0	0

"We are, Gentlemen, your obedient servants,
"DELOITTE, DEVER, GRIFFITHS, & Co."

The trade for each of the years covered by the above certificate shows a very large increase over the preceding year, due to the largely increasing population of the neighbourhood, and to the acquisition from time to time of suitable tied houses, and for the period from 31st March, 1896 (the date when the last balance-sheet was made up), to the date of the issue of this Prospectus, shows a substantial increase compared with the trade of the corresponding period in the previous year.

Apart from any increase in the trade or profits (which the Chairman and the other Directors do not take into account), and taking the profits of the last year, after charging bad debts, and making ample provision for depreciation, &c., as certified by Messrs. Deloitte, Dever, Griffiths, & Co., namely— £31,123

The sum required to pay interest on the Mortgage and on the Debenture Stock amounts to	£6,600
Dividend on the Preference Shares	7,700
Management and Directors' Fees	2,000
		16,300
Leaving a balance of available for dividend on the Ordinary Shares.		£14,823

It may be mentioned that nine-tenths of the trade of the Brewery is transacted with its own licensed houses, which gives stability and steadiness to the trade and profits. On March 31st, 1896, there was in stock eighteen months' consumption of hops bought at very favourable prices.

The Company takes over the brewery and properties as from September 30th, 1896, free from all liabilities save the mortgage already referred to, and the current trade liabilities, and also free from all preliminary expenses, which the Vendor pays.

The amount to be paid for the entire business and properties (under the below-mentioned Agreement, between William Harris, of the one part, and John D. Robinson, as Trustee for the Company, of the other part) is £420,000, payable as to £30,000 in Debenture Stock at par, £30,000 in Preference Shares, £30,000 in Ordinary Shares, and £330,000 in cash. Five per cent. interest on the purchase-money will be paid from September 30th, 1896, as from which date the Company takes over the business, to the date or dates of payments. The Vendor will also be entitled to the premium on the Debenture Stock.

Application will be made in due course to the Committees of the Stock Exchanges in London, Birmingham, and Dublin for a special settlement and official quotation for the Debenture Stock and the Preference and Ordinary Shares.

Applications for Stock and Shares should be made on the application form, and sent with deposit payable on application to The Nottingham Joint Stock Bank, Nottingham; or to The London and Midland Bank, 52, Cornhill, London; Leicester, Birmingham, and other Branches; or to the Bank of Ireland, Dublin, Belfast, and Branches.

If fewer Shares are allotted than are applied for, the balance of the deposit paid will be applied towards the amount payable on Allotment, and any surplus will be returned.

Full Prospectuses and Application Forms may be obtained from the Bankers and Brokers to the Company.

Especially, for the reason given last week, would I advise that applications for the large Dolls should not be delayed.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication, to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Buildings, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on post-cards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand; whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 910.

I am sorry to say that it has come to my knowledge that LE ROI, like W. W. P., has included in his list of yearlings the names of two horses which are in training. It is, therefore, impossible, under the conditions of the competition, to award him the prize. I have accordingly made another selection, and to prevent further trouble and delay, have submitted it to a sporting friend, who has promised to let me know if the chosen list of names is in all respects in accordance with the conditions laid down when the competition was given. The result of my communication with him I shall be able to publish next week.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 918.

The result of this competition will also be announced next week.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 920.

The Prize in this competition has been divided between CANDLEMAS and IVY LEAVES, for their descriptions of North Berwick and St. Pair, published in last week's TRUTH.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 924.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered this week for

THE BEST PROVERB, OR SENTENCE OF AN EPIGRAMMATIC CHARACTER, FORMED BY TAKING AND COMBINING SINGLE WORDS TO BE FOUND IN THE CURRENT ISSUE OF THIS JOURNAL. THE SENTENCES FORMED MUST NOT CONTAIN LESS THAN FIFTEEN WORDS, BUT MAY CONTAIN MORE.

The words used may be selected from any part of the present number, including the advertisements, Puzzle Pages, and the cover. Not more than one word is to be taken from any one line, nor must the last word of one line and the first of the next be chosen in succession. The proverbs or sentences formed may be adaptations of existing ones or entirely original. Competitors may send in more than one effort if they please, on condition that all answers reach me by the morning of Monday, October 19.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name, with the address, of VINDEX, winner of a half of Prize No. 917, is William Herbert Turl, Esq., 38, Hartington-street, Belfast.

 The real name and address of NIN-NIN, winner of half of Prize No. 917, is Mrs. H. S Hardy, River View, Gilford, Co. Down, Ireland.

CULPEPPER.—In your excellent lines on Saltburn the word printed "Cambria's" should obviously have been "Cumbria's." I regret the misprint.

E. S.—Many thanks for your letter and its interesting enclosure.

ARCH GIBBS.—I am obliged to you for your notes. Such a competition as you suggest will, I hope, be given shortly.

COLIN.—I am glad you are able to join in the competitions again.

RUGELEY.—The fourth line of your description of Conway should have read "I scan the stretch of scenery around."

A. H. G.—Thanks for your note, which I received in due course.

ORLANDO.—You will see that I have adopted the plan you suggest.

E. D. W.—Such a competition as you suggest was given some years ago in these pages.

EAST ANGLIA.—I am much obliged to you for your letter.

FRANK.—The nom de plume fairly belongs to you.

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

ENTRE NOUS.

It will interest those readers of mine who are preparing for the Truth Doll-Dressing Competition to learn that the Goldsmiths' and Silversmiths' Company, of 112, Regent-street, have again presented a Lady's Gold Watch to serve as the First Prize in connection with the coming Show. Details of the numerous other prizes which are to be offered will be shortly published. Meanwhile, let me say that there are still Dolls, both large and small, available for early applicants. I would also mention the important fact that the Truth Toy Fund is now open.

The Queen is to hold a Council at Balmoral next week, when Parliament will be prorogued from the 31st. It is probable that the next session will begin on Tuesday, January 26.

It is announced that the Emperor of Russia has asked the Queen to pay a visit to St. Petersburg next year, and that her Majesty has accepted the invitation. There is not a particle of foundation for this statement, which is a pure and simple invention from beginning to end. The Queen would never dream of undertaking any such expedition for many reasons. A visit to the Court of Berlin has been due from the Queen for several years, but her Majesty has excused herself from going either to Coblentz or to Potsdam, on the ground of being unequal to the fatigues of the inevitable functions which she could not possibly escape. A trip to St. Petersburg, however, would be a far more serious affair, and it would, besides, involve a visit to Berlin or Potsdam. The thing is altogether preposterous and entirely out of the question.

A paragraph has been going round the papers which states that all the expenses in connection with the visit of the Emperor and Empress of Russia will be defrayed by the Queen herself. This is incorrect. Many years ago it was settled between the Queen and the Government of the day that her Majesty should not be asked to pay the expenses of any "political" visits of Foreign Sovereigns. As a matter of fact, the expenses of the Russian visit are to be paid by the country, and the charges will be included in the Foreign Office Votes, as has previously been done on similar occasions.

It is announced that the Emperor of Russia has been graciously pleased to bestow an Order which he has recently founded upon some hundreds of "journalists" of all countries, who were present at Moscow during the Coronation fêtes, and a number of these persons are to receive the medal of St. Andrew as well. I see it stated, with much apparent complaceney, that the Order of St. Andrew is "the Garter of Russia." This is true enough, but there is as vast a gulf between the Order of St. Andrew and the Medal of St. Andrew as there was between Dives and Lazarus. The Medal of St. Andrew is, in reality, a decoration which is bestowed in Russia upon a well-conducted Court footman, a tradesman who has given satisfaction, a forester who has managed a successful hunt, or any persons of analogous position whom it is desired to reward. An innocent foreigner often struts about with the medal of St. Andrew round his neck, thinking that he has been favoured with a first-class decoration, causing all Russians, and other persons en connaissance de cause, to laugh in their sleeves. Alexandre Dumas, the elder, once received the Medal of St. Andrew in return for a novel of Russian life which he had written, but hearing the real value of this decoration, he sent it back to the Imperial Chancellerie, with a politely-ironical letter, whereupon he received, with many apologies for the "mistake," the Order of the Wladimir.

A correspondent who often attends at Court writes:—

Apropos of the question of the walking backwards of certain officials at the Royal Court, whatever may be its origin, can any one suggest why it does honour to a Sovereign, who is also a human being, to have nature outraged by her officers? Human beings are fashioned for forward progression; they rebel against Nature's law when they reverse this method. The result of this rebellion on their part offers a degrading, ludicrous, and melancholy spectacle to all reasonable beings, amongst whom toadies can hardly be classed. Surely in the case in which the Sovereign is a very superior woman, and therefore possessed of the virtue of consideration for others, she must feel afflicted and full of pity for the elderly men who shuffle in front of her with the grotesque idea that they honour her by making themselves ludicrous. If backward-walking functionaries are necessary at a Court, would it not be better that their places should be hereditary, when certain families might by heredity become endowed with the gift of walking backwards naturally?

The Prince of Wales is to pay a visit this month to Lord and Lady Warwick at Easton Lodge, their place in Essex, where they have just arrived from Scotland.

H.R.H., who is at Newmarket this week, comes back to town on Saturday, and on Monday he goes to visit Lord and Lady Londonderry at Wynyard, returning to town on Saturday the 24th, and going again to Newmarket on Monday the 26th. The Princess of Wales left Mar Lodge on Friday afternoon for Balmoral, where she is staying with the Queen for a few days before coming south.

Princess Louise, who has been paying visits since her return from abroad to Mr. and Mrs. Percy Wyndham at Clouds, near Salisbury, and to Lord and Lady Battersea at Overstrand, near Cromer, is going this week to Balmoral, where she will stay until the Queen comes South to Windsor next month, when H.R.H. is to take up her residence at Kensington Palace for the winter.

With reference to my recent paragraphs concerning Walmer Castle, I have now had another letter from the gentleman whom I mentioned last week as having constituted himself a champion of the Lord Warden. On previous occasions this correspondent has addressed me from the Continent, where he could only speak from second-hand information, but he has now returned to his home at Walmer, and since the departure of Lord Salisbury's family he has paid a visit to the Castle. In blustering and violent language, which does not in the least add to the weight of his testimony—rather the reverse—he contradicts the report as to the dismantling of the Wellington room, stating that the relics of the Duke are there still, and that (so he has been told) the chamber has not been occupied as a bedroom; but that Lord Salisbury has used it as his study. As to the grounds, it does not appear that any right of way has been closed; but it is nevertheless a fact that since Lord Salisbury became Lord Warden, new notices have been exhibited at one spot warning off the public. The most interesting and important of the questions to which I referred, however, was the wholesale dismissal of the gardeners formerly employed at the Castle, four of them having periods of service ranging from twenty to thirty years. This my correspondent shirks on the plea that it is "a private matter." Seeing that the Lord Wardenship is a public office, and the Castle public property, the plea is, on the face of it, absurd; and the fact is, of course, that the particulars I gave last week are perfectly correct. As I said then, I do not suppose that Lord Salisbury is himself directly responsible for the dismissal of these old servants, but somebody in his name has got rid of them for a motive which, in view of the circumstances, is not altogether creditable.

Englishmen are inclined, even when taking their holidays, to do like those that came before them. Each year those who are accustomed to take a trip abroad for a few weeks start in August, and "do" either Germany or Switzerland. It never seems to occur to them that they might go further without faring worse, and to this I ascribe it that so few push across—or rather through—the Alps to the Italian lakes. In the month of September the English there are few and far between, but Germans and Americans are as plentiful as sparrows in London. The former do not appear to have realised how easy it is nowadays to get to Northern Italy, nor how pleasant it is there in September. You may start from London at 11 a.m., and the next afternoon be in Italy; and the journey from Homburg and other places loved of English is far shorter. On arriving in Italy you will find yourself in summer—an English summer, when the English summer is over. This prolongation of warm, pleasant weather, the Germans have discovered, and the number of holiday-making Germans who profit by it is legion. Everywhere they are to be found about the Italian lakes, mostly enjoying themselves after the manner of enamoured Teutons, sustaining nature with huge meals, and murmuring to each other their appreciation of the scenery and of each other, hand locked in hand, or publishing their love to all the world in some similar fashion. When Providence created Germans, it endowed them with many solid qualities, but the sense of the ridiculous was not amongst them.

But to enjoy the Italian lakes it is by no means necessary to be honeymooning. What is there to do there? Nothing; and this is their charm. In this age of perpetual excitement, what more agreeable than simply to exist? There are mountains, but it occurs to few to climb them. There are no noxious waters to drink. Day succeeds day in the delicious monotony of doing nothing. In the morning you loll under trees, in the afternoon you loll in a boat, and in the evening you once more loll under trees. Newspapers tell you what is passing in the world of action, but no matter how stirring the events may be, you are only languidly stirred by them; they are, indeed, nothing but a far-off echo. In the long run this lotus-eating existence might pall, but for a month or so it is a grateful change.

I hardly know which I prefer—Como or Maggiore. The former is, perhaps, the more beautiful, but the mountains rise so abruptly from the lake, that there is a sense of confinement. On Maggiore the mountains are at some little distance from the shores, and between them and the water there is a wide strip of hills and plains surpassing rich in verdure. The best place for a sojourn on Como is Cadenabbia, and the best place on Maggiore is Baveno. At each there is an hotel Bellevue, and both are excellent hotels. At Baveno those who are not entirely of the "do nothing" school may bicycle to their hearts' content, for the roads are excellent. A person might do worse than pass a couple of weeks in September at either. But if he is a bicyclist I would advise him to bring his bicycle with him, for those that can be hired in Italy are heavy and ill-made. As mentioned in last week's TRUTH, the members of the French Cyclist Touring Club may introduce their machines into Italy without the deposit of 40 francs. Surely the English C.T.C. might obtain the same concession. The latter would also do well to endeavour to come to some arrangement as to the carriage of cycles through Switzerland. At present it is extortionate.

The Carlsbad season is over now, but the following experience of some recent visitors to that spot is worth bearing in mind in the future. Three Englishmen took rooms at the Hotel Bristol. On their arrival the proprietor asked them if they had come "for the cure," and they replied that they had, wondering what else anybody should go to Carlsbad for. After a few days they were dissatisfied, and desired to move. Three weeks' rent was then claimed, on the ground that they had taken their rooms "for the cure," which meant, they were informed, three weeks. Recourse to law being threatened, they gave way and completed their "cure." Whether the law would have been on the side of the hotel-keeper I do not know, but as it is never wise to engage rooms off-hand at a strange hotel for a lengthened period, I should certainly advise no stranger to go to a Carlsbad hotel "for the cure."

With reference to what was said in TRUTH the other day about typhoid fever in Madeira, I have received a letter from Mr. William Reid, of Madeira, which, without disputing the facts, tends to show both that the authorities are awaking to the necessities of the situation, and that it is possible for visitors, with care, to avoid danger. He states that the Municipality are now inviting tenders for a new water supply, and that arrangements are being made for distributing a sufficient supply of water, of ascertained purity, through the street fountains, while other sanitary improvements are in contemplation. Meanwhile, Mr. Reid informs me that in the hotels with which he is connected the use of the water from the contaminated sources has been discontinued, and all the water is brought from a pure mountain source; while butter and milk are supplied from dairies, the healthiness of which is satisfactorily known. This will, I hope, go far to reassure visitors who desire to avail themselves of the well-known advantages of Madeira as a health resort.

MADAME BLUETTE's fifteen shilling Hats and Bonnets.—41, Green-street, Park-lane, W.

I am told, in regard to the lines on osprey plumage in last week's TRUTH, that milliners are now overcoming the scruples of conscientious lady customers by assuring them that the aigrettes they offer for sale are artificial. Let none of my lady readers salve her conscience with this fiction. These pretended artificial plumes have been repeatedly submitted to naturalists, who have pronounced them to be the genuine feathers of the female osprey, over which there has been so loud an outcry. I believe I am right in saying that nothing approaching to an imitation of osprey plumage has yet been manufactured.

A Sunday or two back a lady, who was taking a prominent part in an open-air musical service close to the National Portrait Gallery, was seen to have an aigrette of unmistakable osprey feathers in her bonnet. I agree with the correspondent who reports this fact, that it is a remarkable instance of the astonishing indifference of some women to considerations of this kind. An empty-headed "woman of fashion" who cares for nothing in regard to her clothes except that they shall look "smart," naturally takes no account of any suffering to her fellow-creatures or the brute creation, which the production of her adornment may involve; but one might hope for something better from a lady of a serious turn who can devote her Sunday evenings to efforts to evangelise the streets of London. I dare say, now, that this good lady, who carried on her head the proceeds of a whole nestful of slaughtered ospreys, would be in a state of uncontrollable indignation over the massacres of Armenians, though the Armenians are really massacred from religious or patriotic motives, and the ospreys in pure wantonness.

Apropos of starving cats, I am asked to mention that a line addressed to the Manageress of the London Home for Lost and Starving Cats, 80, Park-road, Haverstock Hill, N.W., will bring round a servant in livery for the removal of any "unwanted" pussy; or, if the distance is too far, a suitable box for the reception of the animal, the box being conveyed to and fro by Carter, Paterson, & Co. If the cat is really a stray one—a feline bonâ-fide traveller—the Home asks nothing for this accommodation beyond a voluntary donation at the discretion of the sender. Every effort is made to find suitable situations for the vagrants thus received, failing which, the surplus population is packed off three times a week to the lethal chamber at Battersea.

This Home also undertakes, for the modest charge of 1s. and carriage (or servant's fare if a man in livery is preferred) to fulfil the wishes of "owners wishing their pets humanely destroyed" ("mother and kittens counted as one"). I feel sure that many among my readers will be glad to avail themselves of this convenience, and the Home seems in every way an institution worthy of support. But I do hope—indeed I do—that this notice will not lead unprincipled parties to entice away the harmless necessary pussies of their neighbours, and send them off to the lethal chamber in charge of a man in livery.

Up to now the Cuban struggle for independence has aroused only a languid interest in this country, but the latest intelligence to hand bids fair to kindle—amongst a certain class—an eager desire to see the present dilatory efforts brought to a successful conclusion by either one side or the other. The fact is that the genuine Havana cigar will become a thing of the past, if the war is to be continued much longer; even if all differences were arranged within a year from now, it would be impossible to put in a new crop which could be available before the stock now on hand is exhausted, whilst under present circumstances there are no labourers to plant; and if there were, the insurgents would hinder their working, since the districts which raise the finest tobacco placed upon the market are entirely held by the revolutionary party. It is claimed for Havana that nowhere in the world can tobacco of equal quality be produced, but should this unhappy state of affairs go on much longer, it is to be hoped, for the sake of smokers, that this will be found to be fallacious.

I have been asked to raise my voice on behalf of the stake-net fishers of the Solway. I gather that, in consequence of the recommendations of the Fisheries Commission, new regulations are contemplated in the interest of the salmon fishery, which will have the effect of compelling the stake-net fishers to pitch their nets wherever they may be ordered, besides requiring them to deliver over any salmon or grilse found casually in their nets to officials appointed for the purpose. Personally, I cannot pretend to any knowledge of the rights and wrongs of the question, but it is alleged on behalf of the stake-net fishers that they are in the main bonâ fide fishers for white fish, and that to compel them to put their nets wherever an official orders them, rather than where their own experience teaches them to look for fish, will seriously interfere with their means of livelihood; while, at the same time, requiring them to hand over stray salmon or grilse to some representative of the law must be practically inoperative unless a whole army of police and watchers is to be employed to keep an eye on them. The latter point seems clear, for it stands to reason that if an official happens to be in the way when a salmon or grilse is caught, the fishermen will make him a present of the fish, and that otherwise they will not. It looks to me as if these men were to be unjustifiably harried in defence of the interests of more influential parties.

In a Maidenhead paper the proprietors of a local "high-class fish, game, and poultry establishment" advertise that they "will be pleased to hear from gamekeepers and others having game to dispose of during the ensuing season." A correspondent seems to think that the only "others" to whom the advertisement will appeal must be poachers; but I feel sure that this suggestion does an injustice to the firm in question, and certainly it fails to take account of one of the most marked characteristics of many modern sportsmen. The latter no longer dispose of the game they kill among their friends and their poorer neighbours and dependants and charitable institutions, but send it to market, and count the proceeds as so much towards the cost of their sport. Doubtless, gentlemen of this class are the "others" for whom this invitation in the Maidenhead paper is intended.

My opinion has been asked on the merits of the following dispute: During a controversy with the News and Book Gazette respecting the affairs of a trade organisation, Mr. G. J. Farington was challenged by that journal "to show during the last twelve months one issue of the Gazette which has stated anything in the editorial columns in connection with Union matters which has been untrue. If he can do so," added the Gazette, "we will pay over the sum of £10 10s. to any institution Mr. Farington likes to name." Mr. Farington promptly showed that in a recent issue the editor, in justification of one of his criticisms of the Union, had stated that the annual meeting in 1895 was held in Glasgow. This was incorrect, the meeting having been held in London. But, while admitting that it has made an "error," the Gazette declines to pay the £10. 10s. unless Mr. Farington will now furthermore point out "some unfair or untrue criticism." If this was what the editor required in the first place, he should have said so; but as it is, the exact terms of his challenge have been fulfilled by Mr. Farington, and the £10. 10s. ought to be handed over to the institution he names.

May I suggest to the Editor of the Irish Times that if he read Truth regularly he would be better qualified than he is at present for his position of a guide and instructor of his Unionist countrymen? He need not do violence to his feelings by perusing my political views; it will be sufficient for the present if he will study week by week such information as I can give him concerning frauds, impostures, and rascalities of one kind and another. By this means he will at least avoid such an ignominious exhibition as was presented to the world in the Irish Times last week by the publication of a solemn review, a column and a half in length, of "Professor" Garner's book on his pretended African discoveries. Everybody who takes the responsibility of publishing a newspaper ought to know by this time that this Garner is a rank imposter, and that his accounts of his performances in the jungle and elsewhere have been proved by unimpeachable evidence to be a pack of lies. To see an influential British newspaper seriously reproducing long extracts from these fictions, and commenting on them as though they were gospel truth, makes me blush for my profession.

The custom of publishing advertisements of quack medicines in newspapers in the form of items of news or editorial matter "has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished," especially in the provincial Press. The readers of one of the leading West of England papers have had special ground for complaint in this respect during the last week, a flagrant puff of a much-advertised quack remedy being sandwiched in among news matter under the attractive heading, "Narrow Escape of a General's Daughter," and without a mark of any kind to denote that it is really a paid advertisement. The obvious object of the advertisers in such cases is to deceive the more ignorant of the public as to the true nature of a paid advertisement, by making it appear a statement for which the editor is responsible; and editors and proprietors who lend themselves to such deception obviously become parties to a fraud on their readers.

No. I certainly should not advise any of my readers who possess a literary turn to have anything to do with the "MSS. Supply Agency," King's-road, Brentwood, Essex. I give this advice not so much for the benefit of my readers as for the benefit of the agency. In consequence of inquiries that have been addressed to me on the subject, I sent down the other day to King's-road, Brentwood, and found that the MSS. Supply Agency consisted of a very young gentleman, who appeared to have started it in the bonâ-fide belief that he was going to benefit thereby both himself and the literary profession. In the circular that he had sent out, he said that he should give two and a half guineas for short stories, from one guinea to one and a half for interesting articles, and that he would buy poetry "according to length and quality." He was also prepared to send out a list of suggestions for likely articles at the price of 2s. 6d. He assures me that he really had intended to put capital into his agency, and buy MSS. "on spec" at the prices mentioned, with a view to reselling it at a profit in the market. If such is the case, I can only say that he ought to be deeply indebted to me for warning authors not to sell anything to him, for I am sure that, unless his capital is virtually unlimited, his enterprise, if persisted in, will speedily land him in the Bankruptcy Court.

Although Manning Press, the biographer of county nonentities, has lately been concealing his identity under an assumed name, in consequence of the inconvenient publicity accorded to him in TRUTH, Truman Press is still doing his best to maintain the family name and reputation. It appears that Truman is now engaged in an effort to induce all the fools in Surrey to pay him sums of nine or twelve guineas for the privilege of having their biographies and portraits inserted in a book which he is publishing by subscription. This is a trick on which Truman and Manning Press have been engaged for years, and as long as they can find idiots enough to keep the game going, no one can blame them for working it for all it is worth.

I should like to make it known, however, that people who want their biographies and portraits published can get it done on much cheaper terms than by giving one of the Presses an order for three or four copies of a three-guinea biographical work. My office-boy, who has a pretty literary taste, cultivated by carefully reading the proofs of TRUTH every week, tells me that he is quite ready to get up and bring out a book of this description at 2s. 6d. a head, if his clients will supply their photos and the necessary biographical materials. He proposes to do it in the Manning Press style. The first volume will be entitled "Middlesex Muffs," and will be followed in due course by "Nottingham Noodles," "Yorkshire Yokels," "Dorsetshire Dolts," and so on. He is a very deserving boy, and if he can add a few pounds to his income by ministering in this way to the vanity of his fellow-creatures, I shall be very glad.

A few months ago the Pall Mall Magazine amused the public by announcing its discovery of an unpublished sonnet by Wordsworth, which turned out to be simply a few lines from one of his best known works. Another literary mare's nest has been exciting some addle-brained admirers of Sir Walter Scott in the United States and in Scotland. A New York paper recently published a letter purporting to be written in 1823 by Scott to Samuel Warren, in which he gave a categorical denial to the rumour that he was the author of the Waverley Novels. Sir Walter's enthusiastic admirers, actuated by a zeal that is not according to knowledge, have been asserting that Scott could not have made a false statement, and that the letter is an impudent forgery, as, if it were genuine, it would not have been so long kept from the world. These worthy people will be dismayed to learn that the letter, so far from being new, as they ingenuously suppose, was printed by Warren himself in the preface to his "Miscellanies," a work which was published by Messrs. Blackwood in December, 1854. The book is now before me, and in Scott's letter (dated, "Abbotsford, August 3, 1823") he writes, "I am not the author of those novels which the world chooses to ascribe to me, and am therefore unworthy of the praises due to that individual, whoever he may prove to be."

The appointments recently made to the teaching staff of the new Northern Polytechnic, Holloway-road, have, I hear, caused a good deal of surprise and disappointment. Some time back the committee of the Highbury Institute, who have long carried on a similar work in the neighbourhood, had an interview with the Governors of the Polytechnic, when the latter agreed to purchase the apparatus of the Institute, and promised to give preference, as far as possible, to the Highbury teachers in forming the new staff. The teachers themselves waited upon the principal of the Polytechnic, and came away with the belief that they would be appointed. In the result, however, all the old teachers have been passed over, among them being one with eighteen years', and another with fifteen years' service, whose claims have been set aside in favour of new-comers to the district. If the Governors wished to have an entirely free hand in the selection of the staff for the Polytechnic they should have said so, but having entered into an understanding on the subject they ought to have adhered to it.

A curate writes:—

> No member of a Theological College, past or present, can help feeling hurt by the remarks made in TRUTH lately. The writer forgets that there are different classes in those colleges, and to attain a first, or even a second, requires close study, and ability certainly not below the average.

There is a good deal more to the same effect, which I need not quote. I have no desire to hurt the feelings of members of Theological Colleges, past or present. I doubt not that these Colleges have turned out, and are turning out, many learned men and accomplished scholars. But, looking at the results in the mass, I still question whether a good deal of inferior material does not find its way through the mill, and the original remark in TRUTH about the Bishop's requirements seems to me a fair one.

A friend of mine, who once had occasion to interview Archbishop Benson on a matter of business, told me that no one, meeting him for the first time, would have suspected the Archbishop of being half as deep as he was. That, I take it, was the secret of the late prelate's success through life, as well as in the last office he held. Beneath his singular suavity of manner and amiability of temper lay considerable astuteness, fortified by knowledge of men and affairs. The unkindest criticism ever passed on him has been that he was all things to all men; but this only means that he was a diplomatist rather than a statesman. He is not to be numbered among those Primates who have left their mark on the history of the Church by sagacity or force of character. But by universal consent he filled his post, never a less easy one than now, with conspicuous tact and discretion, and exemplary dignity. Not only did he make no enemies, but he won, as few eminent ecclesiastics have done, the affectionate respect of all parties in the Church—and of most outside it—and that without any compromise with his own sympathies and principles, which were, of course, strongly with the advanced High Church party. Episcopacy in the English Church seems to be becoming more and more of an ornamental institution, and, if that were its true place, Archbishop Benson might be regarded as an ideal Primate.

In private life the late Archbishop was the most genial and charming of men, and his conversational powers were exceptional. He was also an admirable preacher and speaker, and had very little of the "old schoolmaster" manner which was so conspicuous in Archbishop Tait. Universal sympathy must be felt for Mrs. Benson, who is a very clever woman, and had been a valuable helpmate to the Archbishop ever since he went to Wellington College in 1858. Benson was a born organiser and administrator, and his gifts were improved and developed by his Wellington College work. Indeed, he was clever beyond common at whatever he put hand to.

The papers are already speculating as to the succession to the Primacy. The Archbishop of York and the Bishops of Durham and Wakefield are all too old to be translated. The appointment will rest between the Bishops of Winchester, Peterborough, and Rochester. If Bishop Davidson goes to Lambeth, then the Bishop of Ripon will be offered Winchester.

No public man has lost ground in the popular estimation during the last few years half so much as the Bishop of London, and every one who remembers the furious clamour which arose from "loyal Churchmen" (i.e., hot-headed fanatics) during the autumn of 1869, when Dr. Temple was nominated to the See of Exeter, must smile with contempt over the transformation in the views of that "Liberal" ecclesiastic, who might really be added to Sydney Smith's list of "right reverend renegades." At Shrewsbury the Bishop made his final plunge, by going over, bag and baggage, to the rate-aid party.

Canon Hawkins, who died last week at the age of ninety-six, had held the vicarage of Newport for more than forty years when he resigned it in 1882. He was highly esteemed by all classes in the town, and was for a lengthened period one of the most prominent, and most popular, and influential ecclesiastics in the Principality. Canon Hawkins was a clever and a sensible man, a hard-worker, a most independent thinker, and a hater of all shams and fads, while he was also most courteous, genial, and hospitable. He was the intimate friend and the constant and confidential adviser of Bishop Ollivant, who in 1862 gave him a residentiary stall in Llandaff Cathedral, which he held until his death. He was frequently consulted by the other Welsh bishops, and notably by Connop, Thirlwall, and Vowler Short. Canon Hawkins had a rich store of reminiscences of interesting people, notably of Bishop Copleston and Bishop Carey, for both of whom he had a great admiration, and he also saw a great deal at various times of Bishop Hampden and Bishop Monk. He was a tolerant and a wide-minded man, and thoroughly in sympathy with his distinguished colleague at Llandaff, Dean Vaughan.

In the course of his sermon before the Church Congress the Archbishop of York remarked that "there was certainly a growing opinion, in which he was bound to say that he largely sympathised, that a great readjustment of the general income of the Church must before long be undertaken." It is gratifying to hear of his Grace's sympathies in this direction; but I venture to suggest that pending the consummation of such a movement a great deal of good might be done by putting an end to some of the more glaring abuses which flourish under the existing state of things. There is, for instance, the case of one of the Archbishop's Suffragans, Bishop Blunt, who is also Vicar of Scarborough and a Residentiary Canon of York. What with his episcopal duties and his term of residence at York, he is necessarily absent from Scarborough for a very considerable portion of each year, and the work of his parish has to be delegated to curates. That this should be allowed year after year is a gross scandal, and the Archbishop could not give a more practical proof of his desire for reform than by exerting his authority and influence to prevent such an unfair combination of offices and emoluments in the hands of one cleric.

By the way, I am glad to see that a meeting in support of the objects of the Curates' Union was held during the Congress week. There were many clergymen who derided this organisation when it was established a year ago, but it has survived their criticisms, and, according to the report presented at Shrewsbury, has made very satisfactory progress. If it is only properly supported, the Union ought to be of great use to the unbeneficed clergy.

The discussion on "Church Discipline" at Shrewsbury was really very funny, as showing the grinding tyranny which clergymen would exercise over their congregations, if they could only get their own way. Here was actually Canon Gore demanding that a list of communicants should be kept in each parish, who would have privileges of representation (whatever that may mean) if they were regular in their attendance. It was also proposed to "excommunicate" persons who have been confirmed, if they are guilty of any misconduct. This would introduce the Presbyterian keeping-in order and systematic prying and spying, from which Scotch congregations have suffered so severely. Canon Gore also insists that clergymen who are loose in their doctrines should be banished, entirely forgetting that his own contributions to "Lux Mundi" would have caused him to be drummed out of the Church of England if only the severely orthodox party could have had their way. The fact is that when once a clergyman begins to look out for promotion he quickly recognises the necessity for modifying extreme practice and doctrine, and of generally drawing in, so far as not to be regarded as an irreconcileable.

Some pungent observations on the Scottish sanctimoniousness, particularly in regard to the Holy Sawbath, which goes hand in hand with the most greedy sweating, are sent me by a Glasgow correspondent. He refers as an illustration to one of the largest wholesale warehouses in that city where the clerks were lately kept at their desks from Friday morning till Saturday night with only short intervals for meals. There are plenty of unemployed clerks in Glasgow, and the managers of the establishment might easily have obtained temporary assistance, but they would never be guilty of the extravagance of paying for services which they can get done for nothing by a little determined slave-driving. As for the idea of letting the staff finish the work on Sunday instead of losing a night's rest, it could not be entertained for a moment. To the minds of truly pious persons like these sweaters, the breaking of the Sabbath is the one unpardonable sin. For the rest of the week they may commit every sort of oppression and injustice, but on the Sabbath they repair to kirk, and like, the Pharisee of old, thank God they are not as other men.

The Haberdashers' Company have appointed the Rev. D. A. Townend to the living of All Saints', Hatcham Park, thus accomplishing the job foreshadowed in Truth a fortnight ago. Mr. Townend is a gentleman just thirty years of age, who has been less than two years in priest's orders, and was only ordained deacon in 1893. It is no disparagement of him personally to say that under these circumstances he is not qualified to take charge of a large London parish, nor can there be any pretence for saying that he has given evidence of such qualification. It is impossible that he can have done so. His selection in preference to many highly-qualified, experienced, and deserving clergymen, is obviously due to family influence and private intrigue, and is a fresh proof of the unfitness of such bodies as the Haberdashers' Company to exercise any trust of this nature.

It is surprising what a lot of benevolent individuals there are ready to come to the assistance of the poor clergy who are suffering from the effects of agricultural depression. Even commercial agencies are offered to them by enterprising tradesmen. There is a Mr. Arrowsmith, who is in business at Basford, Stoke-on-Trent. He sends out a circular specially addressed to clergymen, containing his price-list of crockery, with special reference to the suitability of his goods for bazaars, school prizes, christening and wedding presents, and so on, and then he adds the following paragraph:—

> It is impossible for me to send a circular to every member of the community, and I have therefore adopted the expedient of addressing the principal clergy, knowing that they, more than any one else, know and are known by the people among whom they live. Should you, therefore, wish to have some circulars to place before any of your friends, I will send them with pleasure; and should the amount of orders received from your parish amount to £5, shall have pleasure in allowing you a discount of 2s. in the £ on every £, as a contribution to any benevolent object that you may indicate, so that supposing you and your friends in the parish order say £10 worth, my contribution to be deducted from that sum will be £1.
> I think it will be worth your while to consider this, and I shall be glad to hear from you.—I am, Reverend and Dear Sir, yours obediently, J. A. Arrowsmith.

Why need the country clergy starve when they can supplement their spiritual office by touting for orders for houses of business?

A few weeks back I took the liberty of suggesting to the Rector of Little Oakley, Harwich, that he was doing a very unwise thing in bringing up his little girl, ten years old, to the begging-letter trade. It may be remembered that Miss Elsie Allen was writing a letter stating that she was ten years old, and begging people to help her collect £100 for her father's new church, or give her something for a bazaar about to be held for that object. It now appears that Miss Winnie Allen, aged eight, is also circulating a similar letter: in fact, the only difference I can see between the two is that Winnie, considering that she is two years the younger, writes a much better hand than Elsie. A good many people who have received these appeals seem to think that children might be better engaged than in sending out letters of this description, and I quite agree with them.

The man Edward Henville, who brings discredit on the Church of England by writing begging letters wholesale from the Rectory, Chipping Warden, is now begging for money to send his daughter to a lunatic asylum, for which purpose he requires, he says, £30 a year. I advise no one to believe these statements, or any others emanating from Henville, without independent testimony of their correctness. He is always trumping up some story about his children, who are by all accounts little better than he is himself; and if the daughter whom he is now trying to get into a lunatic asylum is the one who was before the public for another reason not many months ago, she is certainly no object for charity. I have sometimes thought that Henville himself would make a very good candidate for a lunatic asylum, and it is the most charitable view to take of his vagaries.

A Watford ratepayer writes to me complaining that Truth has been withdrawn from the Free Library there. As I have often explained, this is a kind of grievance which I am not personally anxious to get redressed, because it is obviously to my advantage that people who want to read the paper should have to buy copies for themselves, instead of seeing it at a free library. Still, it is the duty of the managers of such institutions to supply any journal which is in request among the readers, and if it be true, as is suspected, that the stoppage of Truth in this instance is the outcome of the resentment felt in certain quarters at some paragraphs which have appeared in these columns—one commenting upon the miserable pay of the assistant in the library, and others dealing with various local magnates—the fact is anything but creditable to the Committee.

I have received the following amounts towards this year's Toy Fund for providing toys at Christmas for the poor children in the London hospitals, workhouses, workhouse schools, and infirmaries:—M. E. Carpet Beating Season.—The Queen says: "A good place to send carpets to is the Compressed Air Carpet and Tapestry Cleaning Company, Brook Green, Hammersmith, W. Dust blown out. No beaters used." To prevent deception carpets cleaned by this process bear the Trade Mark on the back.

Perhaps some of my Dublin readers can tell me whether there is any foundation for the following statement. I hear that while Lord Roberts and his family were at the Headquarters Block at the Curragh this summer, the drains were opened up, in consequence of the atrocious smells that pervaded the place; and it was then found that the pipes had been laid with a fall towards the hut, instead of away from it. If this statement be accurate, it is the most disgraceful piece of evidence that has yet come to light of the incompetence of the Royal Engineers in sanitary matters.

By the way, in reference to this matter a military correspondent points out to me a conspicuous flaw in the argument of the gentleman whose defence of the sanitation of Dublin Barracks was noticed in Truth a week or two back. It is this, that the cases of enteric fever in the Dublin hospital presumably come from the most unhealthy and crowded portions of the town, and that it is altogether unjustifiable to compare the sanitary condition of such districts with that of costly public buildings like the various barracks, inhabited by picked men, young and well cared for. Enteric fever, and other diseases of the same class, are dirt diseases, which may be expected in the slums, but ought not to be found in the Royal and other barracks, on the improvement of which vast sums of money have recently been expended.

Another correspondent asks why all General Officers Commanding Districts do not take advantage of Sect. 21, Par. 15a, Queen's Regulations, and permit the P.M.O.'s on the staffs to deal with sanitation, as other officers on their staff deal with their special branches. I suppose the reason is to be found in the impression prevailing throughout military circles that doctors know nothing about sanitary matters, and that the Royal Engineers possess on these subjects a wisdom approaching to omniscience. I will not go so far as to say that all Army Doctors could be safely regarded as sanitary experts, but I am quite sure that most of them know quite as much about sanitation as the Royal Engineers, to whom the sanitary arrangements are at present committed, and probably the majority know a great deal more. The truth is that our military administration is about fifty years behind the times on matters relating to sanitation, and some steps ought to be taken to place all such questions under the jurisdiction of sanitary specialists—whether Engineers or medicos is immaterial.

It will be interesting to know whether Lord Wolseley, during his visit to Portsmouth, has made any inquiries into the history of the recent attempt to keep the Wiltshire Regiment in the Portsdown Forts during the winter. It has already been mentioned in Truth that this attempt had failed, and the 2nd Wiltshire marched into Victoria Barracks, Portsmouth, a few days before Lord Wolseley's visit. The suggestions that have been made in regard to this matter are peculiarly discreditable to the officer chiefly concerned. It was alleged that Colonel Hayne had misled the General as to the prevailing feeling among his officers on the subject, and that he endeavoured by such means to keep the regiment in the forts to suit the convenience of himself and one or two other officers, in defiance of the wishes and welfare of the whole of the rest of the regiment. Without endorsing this suggestion, I offered Colonel Hayne the hospitality of my columns to refute the allegation, if it was unfounded. Of this the Colonel has not availed himself, while, on the other hand, the remarks on the subject in TRUTH have been followed by the revocation of the General's previous decision, and the removal of the regiment into more suitable winter quarters. What is the conclusion?

In spite of the outcry raised on the subject the other day, the proprietor of the drinking bar off St. Martin's-lane, known as the Chandos Buffet, still maintains the obnoxious regulation by which men wearing the Queen's uniform are charged double price in the saloon bar. The latest victims of this regulation are a quartermaster-sergeant of the 6th Dragoon Guards and an N.C.O. of the 1st Life Guards, who, on walking into this bar the other day, were requested to step into another apartment, and told that they would be charged double if they remained there. In the case of a public-house little more than a stone's throw from Seven Dials there is not even the excuse for regulations of this kind which can be put forward in the case of the coffee-room of some country hotel. It is absurd to suggest that the sort of people who frequent the saloon bar of a place like the Chandos Buffet are morally or socially superior to warrant or non-commissioned officers in the Army. Regulations based on that assumption are an insult to the Army, and calculated to place a degrading stigma on soldiers in the eyes of their fellow citizens, and for this reason Licensing Justices ought to be empowered to put a stop to all such practices.

An amusing story is sent to me from a regiment in the Channel Islands, turning on the affectionate interest and sympathy lately felt with a colour-sergeant who had a bad illness, and had looked at one time as though he would be unable to complete his twenty-one years' service; and the sudden change of the sentiments of the man's comrades when he not only completed his twenty-one years, but proceeded to re-engage for another five. It looks as if this case were another example of the slackness occasionally shown in regard to allowing men to re-engage. At any rate, it is to be hoped that the colour-sergeant is now sufficiently recovered to be able to undertake some of the duty which seems for some time past to have been performed by his sympathetic comrades.

The Army Medical Staff sometimes have good cause to pray to be delivered from their friends. The other day the British Medical Journal published the lamentations of a correspondent who had noticed that, on the monument at Brighton, to the memory of the officers and men of the Royal Sussex Regiment who had perished in Egypt, "all the poor fellows whose names are recorded receive their army rank, except two medical officers, who are simply 'Dr.,' and of all things, their names are sandwiched between the lance-corporals and the privates." On which the B.M.J. gravely remarks that "the omission of their rank, and the place where their names are placed on the monument are sad incongruities." Far be it from me to extenuate any fresh slight to the dignity of the Army Doctor. I venture, however, to suggest to my contemporary and its correspondent that the letters "Dr." are, for once in a way, intended to denote, not a medical man, but a drummer.

A correspondent, whom I take to be an Army man, takes exception to what I said the other day about the desirability of holding the medical examination of cadets before the educational. His point seems to be that by spending a few shillings on taking a medical opinion beforehand parents can satisfy themselves as to the physical fitness of their sons, and so guard against the possibility of the lads being disappointed of their commissions after passing their educational examination. With all respect, I cannot endorse this view. Most fathers, one would suppose, already take medical advice as to the general soundness of their sons before going to the expense of having them prepared for Army examinations; and I can point to specific instances in which this has been done, and in which a youth has nevertheless been knocked out by the Army Medical authorities, in direct opposition to the opinions of several practitioners who had previously examined him.

Not only have instances of this sort of thing been referred to in TRUTH, but one or two of them have been so flagrant as to suggest doubts as to the bona fides or the competency of the medical boards. The Service journal which is chiefly devoted to carping at TRUTH waxed indignant the other day over the mere suggestion that the present system lends itself to abuse. I have only to say in reply that facts stand on record which neither that journal, nor any other apologist of official wrong-doing, could possibly explain away; and the suspicions to which I have alluded are widely shared in the Service.

With regard to eyesight, however, it would seem that the qualifications of candidates can be definitely ascertained before they are entered for examinations. I understand from another source that an official standard is now laid down for the guidance of medical examiners, which deprives them of the discretion they were formerly allowed. Every candidate can ascertain what the standard is, and any medical man can apply the test. There is no reason, therefore, why any candidate should be "spun" for defective eyesight after he has passed the educational part of the examination. The question still remains, however, whether the official standard is not unjustifiably high. I am disposed to think that it is.

Owing to other demands on my space this week, I am unable to deal at present with the large mass of correspondence addressed to me with reference to the 4th Hussars scandal. But I must lose no time in correcting one false impression which may possibly have been created by my remarks on this case. Towards the end of my last week's article reference was made to what might occur in future in "crack cavalry regiments." Several military readers have protested against the implication here that the 4th Hussars is a crack cavalry regiment. "The crack cavalry regiments," writes an old officer, "are the 7th and 10th Hussars, and the 9th and 17th Lancers. They 'go the pace,' but, unlike the 4th Hussars, never speak of it." I only hope they have a different way of going the pace.

A Service correspondent sends me a comment on Major Acheson's case which seems very much to the point. If Major Acheson's discourtesy to Lieutenant-Colonel Bridge was so serious as it has been made out, why was he not placed under arrest, and the case brought before a military court? If this was not done, presumably it was a case in which an apology was deemed sufficient. In that case, why was an apology not accepted? The fact is, I suppose, that, after the Bridge incident was closed, somebody with a grudge against the Major thought that more might be made of it. The stale confidential report (which the War Office had never previously deemed of sufficient importance to call for any of the steps prescribed by the Queen's Regulations) was then dug up, and the two things put together as a pretext for calling for the officer's resignation. The motive behind it all is furnished by the demand made upon him a year or two previously to disclaim the authorship of certain letters distasteful to the ruling lights of his corps.

It has been represented to me that soldiers when employed for a long time as markers at rifle butts have a claim to some allowance for damage to their kits. In support of this, particulars are given me of the results to N.C.O.'s and men of three months' employment in this capacity at Kilworth, every man having virtually worn out three pairs of trousers, one kersey, and one pair of boots, not to mention damage to clothing from exposure in all weathers, the cost of making good the damage being estimated at £2 a head. The case seems analogous to that of men exposed to exceptionally hard wear during manœuvres; and it is only fair that whenever men are put on duty which involves extra wear and tear of clothing, some proportionate allowance should be made to them, either in cash or in kind.

In one or two recent letters that I have had from South Africa reference is made to a very severe bit of marching which the 1st Middlesex Regiment were put through a few weeks back. Starting about 10 a.m., the battalion was marched for fifteen miles with only two halts, under a fierce sun, and with the thermometer above 90 deg. in the shade, no water being obtainable on the way. On returning to camp, seven men were admitted to hospital, suffering with sunstroke and other consequences of the march; and a great many more were badly done up. I understand that one or two of the medical officers expressed the opinion that the work was unnecessarily severe, and it seems the more unjustifiable as the battalion had obtained a very good reputation for its marching when at Aldershot. The present C.O. was only appointed a few months ago, and it is to be hoped that this is not a sample of his discretion.

The Infantry and Royal Engineers stationed at Spike Island have other grievances against the Royal Artillery, besides the division of duties to which attention was called in TRUTH a fortnight ago. There is, it seems, a garrison canteen for the use of all the men of the garrison equally. A grant out of the canteen fund to the amount of 5s. per head has recently been made to each married N.C.O. and private of the Royal Artillery, for the purpose of stocking a piece of ground which the R.A. men are allowed to use for growing vegetables, &c. This money, therefore, though drawn from a common fund, is applied for the exclusive benefit of the Royal Artillery. The same remark applies to some recent grants that have been made for the purpose of sending an R.A. tug-of-war team to the Curragh Summer Sports, while recent sports at Spike Island, though termed Royal Artillery Sports, and as regards a large number of events reserved exclusively for the R.A., also received grants from the canteen fund. It appears that this garrison canteen is exclusively managed by Royal Artillery officers, and it seems to be looked upon as essentially a Royal Artillery concern. But this is clearly unfair to the other corps in the garrison. It may be added that the R.A. also enjoy an unfair monopoly of the various paid billets on the island.

Here is a further batch of minor military grievances which I commend to the attention of the various authorities concerned. The facts all speak, I think, for themselves, and all are deserving of notice:—

Depot, Essex Regiment, Warley.—A married man of the 1st Battalion Essex Regiment, with fifteen years' service to his credit, has just been turned out of comfortable quarters which had been allotted to him in barracks a fortnight previously, in order to make room for the chef of the officers' mess. The man's wife and three children are in consequence quartered in a couple of rooms a mile away. As the cook has no title either to free quarters or fuel allowance, this treatment seems very unfair to the soldier, and calls for some explanation.

Medical Staff Corps, Royal Infirmary, Dublin.—The other day a corporal belonging to the detachment at this station made a prisoner of an orderly for not complying with a certain order. Later in the day the sergeant-major made a prisoner of the corporal in respect of the same order, although the corporal explained that he had already preferred a charge against the orderly for the same reason. On the following morning the corporal attended at orderly room with his prisoner; whereupon the sergeant-major informed him that he was the man wanted and not the orderly, and told the orderly to go about his business. The corporal then went before the C.O., and was acquitted. He explained to the C.O. what had passed between himself and the sergeant-major, but no notice was taken of his statement. What authority the junior N.C.O.s can possibly be expected to have if the sergeant-major is left free to treat them in this way perhaps some one more learned than I in the mysteries of military discipline will explain.

2nd Somerset Light Infantry, Fort George, Guernsey.—The spectacle was recently witnessed of the band of this battalion performing in the public gardens under the conductorship of one of the band boys. The boy in question is the son of the bandmaster, and complaints are rife in the band as to his being excused parades and medical inspection, and enjoying other privileges denied to the other boys and bandsmen. It is probably inevitable that a bandmaster's son should enjoy a somewhat favoured position, but this certainly ought not to extend to his being allowed to publicly conduct a band containing many musicians of more than double his age.

3rd Battalion Rifle Brigade, Murree.—In this battalion it appears to be the practice not to issue any new clothing to men in their eighth year of service, if taking their discharge at the end of that time. In the case of the men who will be leaving this year, the grievance has been aggravated by their being required to furnish themselves with a new cap, which has been issued free to the rest of the battalion, the cost of this cap being

Rs. 1. 14a. 10p. It is certainly not the general practice among British regiments in India to allow the men no new clothing in their last year, and there can be no reason for a special rule to this effect in the Rifle Brigade. There are grievances enough already in connection with the detention of men in India beyond the period for which they have engaged, without this.

2nd Inniskilling Fusiliers, Chakrata.—A deficiency of Rs. 71 was lately discovered in the accounts of the supper-bar in connection with the branch of the Army Temperance Association in this regiment, the bar having been open only two months. On the matter being inquired into, the private in charge of the bar offered to make the deficiency good by paying Rs. 50 down, and the balance at the end of the month, if he was allowed to remain in charge. This course was adopted by Major Daniels, the President of the Temperance Lodge. At the same time the services of a lance-corporal, who had superintended the working of the Temperance Lodge, were dispensed with, and the whole management apparently left to the barman. Strange to say, at the end of the next month, when the deficiency had been made good by the barman, the month's accounts showed a loss of Rs. 120. on takings to the amount of Rs. 290. As all the principal articles sold are priced at a considerable profit on the wholesale cost, the management of the institution seems to call strongly for further investigation.

A monstrous decision was given by the Plymouth Borough Bench last week in the case of a private in the R.M.L.I., named Henry Parsons. He was charged with using obscene language, the only witness against him being a policeman. His defence was that the policeman had made a mistake, and that the bad language which he heard was used by another Marine, who was speaking to Parsons, and who was under the influence of liquor. Parsons bore two good-conduct badges, and one of his officers testified to the man's excellent character during the six years he had been in the Service. It was manifestly quite possible for even a policeman to have made a mistake in identifying the offender in a busy street at night, and, recognising this, the Chief Constable asked the magistrates to allow the defendant the benefit of any doubt that might exist. Notwithstanding this recommendation, the magistrates insisted upon convicting Parsons, and fined him 10s. 6d., the Chairman (Mr. Wills) remarking:—"When charged at the police-station you were not at all indignant, and took it as a matter of course." As a matter of fact, the constable had admitted that at the police-station Parsons told him he had "made a tremendous mistake," and "got the wrong man." What more would the sapient Wills have an accused person say or do when under arrest at the police-station? Does he expect a prisoner to storm and rage, and swear that he is innocent? It would seem so.

Can any of my Service readers assist a Naval "domestic" with advice as to the proper way (if any) to obtain his discharge, under the following circumstances:—The man joined in March last, as he understood, for six months. At the end of four months he had an offer of a berth from the shipping company in the service of which he had formerly been employed, and not liking the look of his prospects in the Navy, he applied for his discharge. This was refused. At the end of his six months he desired to apply again, but the president of the mess in which he was serving declined to sign the application, and he was not allowed to see the Captain on the subject. Domestics are not "continuous service" men—they join for a limited period. In the event of a man being refused his release at the end of his engagement, what is he to do?

It is no matter for surprise that the man referred to should be desirous of getting out of the Service—more especially when he has an offer of a good berth elsewhere. The "domestics" in the Navy are in many respects most unfairly treated. The fact of their being non-continuous service men means that at the end of every commission their pay ceases until they get another job—a condition for which, so far as I know, there is no parallel in any other branch of the Service. The pay is very poor—especially in the second and third classes—and no man can earn a good conduct medal, however good his character, until he has been rated for three years in the first class, when he may have been twelve or fourteen years or more in the Service. The worst grievance, perhaps, is the expense of the kit, which costs a man on first joining £6 or £7, or some four or five months' third-class pay. In principle the naval system of confining domestic service to a totally distinct class of men is an excellent one, and might, I think, be extended to the Army with advantage. But the way it is worked leaves much to be desired.

Further light is highly desirable on the process by which the verdict of the coroner's jury on the recent accident on H.M.S. Blake was quashed, with the result that Fleet-Engineer Burner, after a verdict of manslaughter had been returned against him, was left to be tried by court-martial. This court-martial has now resulted in Mr. Burner and Engineer Crichton (who was put on trial with him) being reprimanded and dismissed their ship. They were found guilty of negligence, as I understand it, in failing to replace the gauge-glasses of the boiler, which were defective and consequently failed to indicate the shortness of water which led to the explosion.

A strong feeling prevails in naval circles that the blame for this accident rested, not on Mr. Burner and his subordinate, but upon the Admiralty, and that it lay either in the understaffing of the engine-room or in the radical defects of the gauge-glasses. Had the question of Mr. Burner's negligence been tried in a civil court, this issue would have been investigated by a perfectly independent tribunal. Why was this course avoided, and the issue relegated to a Service court? The Crown Office would not have interfered to quash the verdict of the coroner's jury, unless at the instance of some party concerned in the result. No one in his senses will believe that it was done at the instance of Mr. Burner, who had nothing to expect from the trial of the charge of negligence by a packed tribunal of his official superiors, rather than by a jury of his fellow-countrymen. The inference is that the verdict was quashed at the instance of the Admiralty, with the view of bringing the issue before a tribunal under their own influence, and so making Mr. Burner the scapegoat of their own shortcomings.

This view of the matter will be strengthened by the utterances of the Service journal which invariably places its columns at the disposal of officialdom in emergencies of this kind. Sillier stuff has rarely been put upon paper. I invite special attention to the concluding passage:—

In reality the gauges were not true, and expert evidence has decided that the engineer officers ought to have detected the error. The average engine-room artificer is, no doubt, quite competent to replace a gauge-glass, and we take it that the supervision of the chief engineer or one of his officers is all that is expected in these cases. . . . The reprimand inflicted was consequently warranted by the evidence. It is the fortune of war, and we hope Mr. Burner will soon obtain another appointment. Meanwhile the "Blake" has been supplied with a more efficient pattern of gauge glass, and, judging from the evidence of the experts, it would be as well to supply the new type to the boilers of all her Majesty's ships.

Here is the most direct and convincing admission that the gauge-glasses were of a defective type, and therefore that the ultimate responsibility for the explosion and loss of life rests with the Admiralty. The Admiralty have expressly confessed this by supplying the Blake with "a more efficient pattern of gauge-glass;" and the inspired apologist of officialdom himself accentuates the confession by recommending that the new glasses should be supplied to the whole Fleet.

True, "expert witnesses were agreed that this danger ought to have been detected"—in other words, that the rank and file ought to be more alive to the shortcomings of Admiralty appliances than the Admiralty themselves—but behind this again lies the other question alluded to above—namely, that the engine-rooms are so under-staffed that alertness to every possible source of danger is impossible. This question is of no less importance than that of the gauge-glasses, and it has been successfully thrust out of sight by the Admiralty tactics in dealing with the Blake case. A Naval Officer writing to me on this subject, before the court-martial, said:—

It is to a large extent a matter of luck that similar accidents to that on board the Blake do not occur more frequently. The Blake accident is a sensational example, but the evil at the bottom of it receives frequent illustration. For example, the "Senior" Engineer appointed to H.M.S. Trafalgar in May was invalided home in August, suffering from melancholia, the result of overwork and worry. Every one in the ship, including the Captain, blamed the Chief Engineer, who has consequently been superseded. Note, then, the position of a Chief Engineer in a ship. If he insists on work being done so as to ensure against the possibility of accident, he may find himself in the position of the late Chief Engineer of the Trafalgar. If, on the other hand, he trusts to luck to some extent, he runs the risk of finding himself in the position of Mr. Burner.

And when he has got into the position of Mr. Burner, and has been made by a Naval Court the scapegoat of Admiralty cheeseparing or blundering, he will have the comfort of reading in a journal, professedly representing the Service, that "it is the fortune of war"!

Very ugly stories are current in Dublin as to the behaviour of the crew of the Kingstown lifeboat one day last week, when they were summoned to the rescue of a party of men engaged in breaking up the wreck of the Palma—the ill-fated ship which has already been the occasion of one inquiry into lifeboat management. For some reason the lifeboat crew put back without taking the men off the wreck, and the boat was only launched a second time and the rescue accomplished under considerable pressure. Knowing by experience what a virulent outcry is always directed against any one who ventures to question the possibility of anything but disinterested heroism on the part of a lifeboat crew, I refrain from any comment on what took place until I have heard the official version of the facts. In consideration of this forbearance, I hope that Mr. Dibdin, who is always ready with a long letter when the Institution needs a spokesman, will let me know what the official version is, and I will then do my best to help the public to a just conclusion. Anyhow, I trust that the Executive of the Lifeboat Institution will thoroughly investigate the occurrence.

A parcel was recently posted at Bombay addressed to the Seychelles Islands, the postmaster having previously informed the sender that there was a parcel post from India to the Islands. The parcel did not reach its destination for upwards of three months; and inquiry then revealed that it had been first sent from Bombay to London, then returned from London to Bombay, and finally sent from Bombay to the Seychelles. The truth seems to be that the postmaster was mistaken in stating that there was a direct parcel post between Bombay and the Seychelles Islands, and the parcel was therefore sent to London on the chance of St. Martin's-le-Grand being able to dispose of it. But why, on being sent back from London to Bombay, it was not again remitted to London, and did not continue to travel on this orbit for all time, like a comet, is one of those Post Office mysteries which an outsider cannot solve. There seems, however, no reason now why the Indian Government should not send parcels direct to the Seychelles without the preliminary formality of sending them to London and back, as there is a regular line of steamers running between Bombay and the Islands.

Indian officialdom has hit upon a novel and highly ingenious dodge for negativing the benefits supposed to be conveyed by the Exchange Compensation Allowance. A man in the Civil Service was granted this allowance in the usual course, and drew it for some months. It was then suddenly stopped at the instance of an accounts official—an official, by the way, of lower grade than the one who originally granted the allowance—and the question of the right of the civilian to the allowance was referred to the Government. Over eighteen months have since elapsed without the Government pronouncing any decision, and in the meantime the victim remains deprived of his Exchange Compensation. An announcement recently appeared in the Pioneer to the effect that the Secretary of State could not deal with any of these cases at present, so that there is every prospect of the men whose allowances have been stopped in this way remaining out in the cold for an indefinite period. In regard to the gentleman whose case I refer to, there does not seem to be the slightest ground for raising any question. He was born and educated out of India, and no near relative of his has ever been in the country, so that none of the subtleties that have been raised over the question of domicile arises in his case. Apparently this is simply one more dodge on the part of the Indian Government for taking away with one hand what it gives with the other.

Respecting the death of Mr. D'Elboux of the Ordnance Survey at Southampton, I have received several communications which tend to aggravate the ugly aspect of the case. It seems that some new scale of measuring work and apportioning pay has recently been drawn up by a committee of Royal Engineer Officers, and, under this scale, a greatly increased quantity of work has been created. Mr. D'Elboux is not the only man in the office who has not been able to work up to the quantity required by the new standard, but this gentleman seems to have been an exceptionally conscientious and painstaking, as well as a very highly skilled worker, and probably the amount of work he put in was specially restricted from this cause. He was nevertheless informed on one occasion that he had only earned about a sixth of his salary, and this seems to have been the incident which preceded his breakdown in health. Its effect may have been aggravated by the nervousness and anxiety which have lately been created in the office by the frequent issue of orders and counter-orders, accompanied by threats of dismissal, reductions of pay, and all other devices which official tyranny can suggest for harrying the staff. The whole organisation and management of this office requires independent investigation. Grievances and discontent have been rife for several years past, but up to the present the complaints seem only to have resulted in chastisement with whips being replaced by chastisement with scorpions.

Some gentleman in the G.P.O. is highly indignant at my remarks on the misappropriation of stationery in Government offices, and writes to tell me that, so far from this being the case at St. Martin's-le-Grand, many of the staff have to buy their own ink, because that supplied by Government is too bad for use. I hasten to assure the clerks in the G.P.O. that my remarks were directed, not to St. Martin's-le-Grand, but to Whitehall, and other spots adjacent. I thought everybody knew that the sweating system prevails throughout the Post Office, except, of course, in a few cases at the top of the tree. Perhaps when the Admiralty orders a new stock of Indian ink for the draughtsmen at Devonport—as I should hope it will do after what has been said on the subject—the Duke of Norfolk will look into the quality of the ink supplied to his subordinates.

If the County Council desires to do a real service to London, steps should be taken to supplant the present steamboat service on the Thames. The service has now been stopped for the winter, presumably because the Victoria Steamboat Company cannot maintain it when the heavy summer traffic is at an end. But with a good municipal service, such as exists at Glasgow, a sufficient number of steamers might be maintained all the year round for the convenience of many who prefer that method of locomotion. Some time since the London Council constituted a Rivers Committee, which prepared a very elaborate scheme for a municipal service of river steamers, but for some occult reason it has never come before the Council. The Moderate members, I understand, have been influential in keeping it back, presumably because they do not wish to interfere with the monopoly of the Steamboat Company. But it is time London had a better service, and I would suggest that some one might ask for the production of the River Committee's report.

The Metropolitan Asylums Board were in trouble last week before Judge Lumley-Smith through the alleged negligence of the authorities at one of their hospitals in dismissing a scarlet fever patient before she had finished "peeling." The Board escaped a verdict on the strength of medical evidence, to the effect that this particular patient was either unusually dilatory in the peeling process, or carried it to unusual lengths. It would be well for the Board if they could now give some equally satisfactory answer to the allegation in last week's TRUTH respecting the abuse of their hospitals by members of the Board. Is there any pretext for denying the statement that a member of the Board—and a wealthy gentleman to boot—has recently had two of his children removed to one of the Board's hospitals? If the statement cannot be denied, and I am quite sure that it cannot without recourse to prevarication, the next question is, have the Board at large any consciousness that this sort of thing is improper and scandalous, and if they have, how do they intend to show it?

A medical man sends me an interesting letter on the subject of the abuse of the out-patient departments of hospitals. He quotes a statement to the effect that the proportion of out-patients to the population in the year 1892 was, in Dublin, 421 per 1,000, Liverpool 399, London 371, Edinburgh 371, Bristol 336, Birmingham 291, Manchester 249, Leeds 222, and Glasgow 139. These figures have been published by Mr. Henry Burdett, but while I have great respect for that gentleman's authority on such matters, I am rather inclined to think that somewhat liberal deductions must be made from the return on account of persons attending several different hospitals, or being registered more than once as out-patients at the same institution. Still, after discounting the statistics in this way, I agree with my correspondent that they point to a gross abuse of the free medical aid which is given in the hospitals in London and most large cities. There is little doubt that considerable numbers of these out-patients are persons who have no just claim whatever to relief at the expense of the charitable public, being perfectly well able to provide for their own medical attendance.

This was, I believe, very clearly proved by the results which followed the appointment of an inquiry officer at the Manchester Royal Infirmary. When this officer began his inquiries into the circumstances of the out-patients it was found that 40 per cent. of the persons who attended the infirmary were in a position to pay for their treatment; but after a time, the knowledge that such investigations were made was in itself sufficient to cause the proportion of undeserving applicants to fall to 6 per cent. Other remedies have been suggested, but on the whole such a system of inspection, carefully and sympathetically carried out so as not to deter genuine subjects for relief from presenting themselves at the hospitals, seems to me to be the most effective way of checking the evil which has undoubtedly grown up through the practice of granting medical treatment at these establishments, practically without discrimination, to all comers. The present state of things is unfair to the public whose charity is misapplied, demoralising to those who take advantage of it, and unjust to the medical profession. Unfortunately, one obstacle in the way of reform is that the managers of hospitals appear to be impressed with the idea that the larger the number of the patients they relieve, out as well as in, the more liberally they will be supported, and so have become fearful of doing anything which will reduce the number.

The professional boycott which sixteen doctors at Weston-super-Mare have recently established against practitioners employed by medical aid associations is, I am informed, only an incident in a general movement, similar action having been taken in almost every part of the country. To justify this action a medical correspondent sends me an extract from an address by Mr. Victor Horsley. All that I find in it, however, is a denunciation of the "miserable man" who sells "his services and his honour" to a "so-called medical aid society;" and an attempt to show that there is a difference between a medical combination against such men and a trade union. "The trade union," it is said, "is founded solely for the benefit of the members of the union, and that benefit is to be obtained regardless of the cost to the public." Does not this precisely describe the position of these new medical combinations?

Mr. Horsley goes on to argue that the difference consists in the fact that "what we know as infamous conduct" is punished in the medical profession, but not in the trade union. Yes; but by whom is it punished? By the General Medical Council. And it is because this Council, the legally constituted body for such purposes, refuses to regard the acceptance of the medical-officership of a medical aid society as a professional offence that these private combinations of medical men are being formed to deal with it by a system of boycotting. How this can be held to be anything else than a form of trade unionism I fail to see. The refusal of the other doctors to consult with the medical aid society man is perfectly analogous to the refusal of unionist workmen to work with a non-unionist. For my own part I strongly approve of trade unionism—for trades. Whether this development of the system in the medical world is desirable in the interests of the public or the profession is another question.

For more than two months past the inhabitants of Sheerness have been suffering from a break-down of the water supply, which has varied intermittently from days of total failure, except for what could be delivered by water carts, to a service through the mains at diminished pressure for a longer or shorter (generally shorter) period daily. From a letter I have received, it appears that, in the first place, something went wrong with the pumping machinery at the well from which the town was being supplied. There is, however, another well which was formerly used, and if the District Council had only had the common prudence to keep this second source of supply in proper working order, and to provide adequate means of storage, the difficulty would have been easily overcome. They neglected to do this, and they furthermore showed a lamentable lack of promptitude and energy in carrying out remedial measures, with the consequence that the period of inconvenience and danger to the community has been unnecessarily prolonged. My correspondent urges that, in a dockyard town where considerable numbers of Government servants are compelled to live, it should be the duty of Government to see that they are not thus left at the mercy of blundering and incompetent local authorities. There is a good deal of force in this, and it is not in dockyard towns alone that such authorities need to be subjected to a sharper supervision from Whitehall.

Some amazing revelations have been made at a Local Government Board inquiry concerning the recent election of a poor-rate collector in the Skibbereen Union. It was conclusively proved that several of the Guardians had demanded or received bribes for supporting different candidates for the office, one member admitting that he asked £15 for his vote, another that he was paid £10, and a third that "his wife" received certain money in connection with the election, while two more "declined to say" whether they had or had not received £17 and £15 respectively for their votes. To do them justice, these gentry appear to have looked upon all this as quite legitimate and proper bargaining, and when canvassed by the candidates they made no attempt to conceal the fact that their votes were at the disposal of the highest bidders. In expressing the opinion that the evidence "discloses a state of corruption in the Skibbereen Union amounting to a public scandal," the Local Government Board is well within the mark, and it is to be hoped that the Irish Law Officers will institute a prosecution against such of the parties as have rendered themselves amenable to the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act of 1889. In any event, the Guardians who have confessed their guilt ought to be forthwith removed from office

I am glad to see that the Eastbourne Town Council last week passed by a large majority a resolution to proceed next session with a Bill for acquiring the present waterworks, and providing a new permanent water supply. There could be, I should have thought, no question that this is the only solution of the recent difficulty; but, nevertheless, a mysterious body, known as the Ratepayers' Association, actually presented a resolution to the Corporation urging the postponement of the question, and expressing alarm at the growing municipal expenditure. How a further continuation of the postponement policy, which has been pursued with such disastrous results for the last twelve months, could improve the situation, or how those who suffer by the growing expenditure of the Corporation would benefit by a course which would speedily reduce Eastbourne to a howling wilderness, only the associated woodenheads themselves can explain.

But there seems no limit to the short-sightedness and stupidity of some of the townspeople on this question. One worthy Alderman, who opposed the resolution, and a prominent licensed victualler to boot, actually contended that the Duke of Devonshire "has quite as much interest in the town as any of those present," and that the matter might therefore be safely left in the hands of the ducal water company. Is the Duke a penny out of pocket by anything that has happened in Eastbourne during the last twelve months? Would the Duke suffer if the town were deserted during the next three seasons? Does the Duke remit his ground-rents during bad seasons? If not, how can any person in his senses suggest that the Duke of Devonshire has the same interest in this matter as his unfortunate tenants?

The Southport and District Highway Board has once or twice come in for notice in these columns on account of its practice of giving the contracts for cartage to the chairman and other members. In the natural course of things the Board would pass out of existence next year in accordance with section 25 of the Local Government Act of 1894, the maintenance of the roads being then transferred to the District Councils. But it appears that in Lancashire (alone among English counties) there is a disposition to prolong the life of these old highway authorities, and the Southport Board have just been invited by the Clerk of the County Council to say whether they desire the Council to apply to the Local Government Board for an order further postponing the operation of the Act of 1894. Considering how comfortably they arrange things for themselves, it is hardly to be expected that the Southport Highway Board will be in favour of their own extinction; and it would be the height of absurdity for the County Council to attach any importance to their views on the subject.

I had hoped that I had done with the sanitation of St. Kitts, but the gentleman who first brought the subject to my notice returns to the attack, and, in the interests of truth, I feel bound to notice what he says. It comes to this, that though the main streets of Basseterre may give the idea that the town is "one of the best and most clean throughout the West Indies," the place is really a whited sepulchre, most of the houses having filthy and unwholesome appendages in the background, while in the slums matters are proportionately worse. Among many instances of the defiance of all proper sanitary regulations, I am told of milk-hawkers frequently keeping their store of milk "under the bed in a filthy negro hut." This is from a witness who has had special opportunities of observation, and who describes only what he has seen with his own eyes. Those residents who pride themselves on their "beautiful little island" will do well to take his warnings seriously.

Certain complaints that have long been current among the inhabitants of Seychelles have lately found expression in a pamphlet which sets forth, in the most unequivocal language, the alleged abuses and shortcomings of various departments of the administration. The administration of justice, in particular, is very severely criticised, and the Judge has issued a circular to a number of persons asking them to let him know whether they have received a copy of the pamphlet, as he is "desirous of ascertaining the extent of the publication" of these "serious libels on his official character." No doubt the Judge will feel it incumbent upon him to follow up his circular by further action, so that the truth or falsity of the statements in question may be properly tested. At the same time, the charges in the pamphlet are too grave and too wide-reaching to be satisfactorily met by any proceedings that may initiated by individual officials. The pamphlet is practically an indictment of the whole system of administration in the colony, and though it has been issued anonymously, it is an open secret in the islands that it has received the approval of many of the leading inhabitants. What they want is a searching inquiry by the Colonial Office into the condition of affairs in Seychelles, and it is to be hoped that such an inquiry will now be granted.

In speaking the other day of the excessive Treasury fees extorted on administration orders, in cases where the assets are limited, I did not exhaust the abuses connected with this mode of procedure. A gentleman in Lancashire, who is, I take it, professionally connected with the liquidation of insolvent estates, writes very strongly on the subject. It is a common thing, he says, for a debtor, against whom a judgment or a committal order has been obtained, to obtain an administration order, which at once stops all proceedings and defeats the creditors. The debtor will then pay little or nothing under the administration order, and when the proceedings have dragged on for two or three years, he gets it rescinded by the Registrar. In the meantime, he has been contracting fresh liabilities, and when they become acute he at once extricates himself by a fresh administration order, and so on. What little money the debtor ever pays under such circumstances goes, as I said the other day, to the Treasury, in the shape of costs, and the creditors rarely get a farthing, and have no means of putting pressure upon the debtor. "An administration order," writes my correspondent, "costs nothing, and thousands apply for and obtain such orders who never intend to discharge their liabilities. I myself know several who have had two or three orders against them, have never paid a penny, and have been defeating their creditors for years." The majority of such bogus applications would probably be stopped, if a substantial deposit were required from the debtor on his application. But the whole procedure in connection with administration orders calls for reform.

The new Land Bill for Ireland supplied the legal profession, and landlords and tenants in that country, with very ample occupation for the long vacation. The consensus of opinion is, that even the longest of vacations does not afford sufficient time for the mastering of the Bill's intricacies. The Irish landlords have lost none of their soreness on the subject, especially their bitterness against the defections from their cause amongst Government officials. The party which put Lord Ashbourne in power would be only too glad to reverse the process now—a natural enough feeling, considering that he reversed the position held in the days when, as Lord Castletown said, Lord Ashbourne walked "shoulder to shoulder with the landlords."

During the hearing of a case at Swindon Police-court last week, the defendant's counsel, Mr. C. F. Gill, called attention to the fact that the magistrate's clerk had been acting as solicitor for the prosecution. This gentleman, it was stated, had obtained specimens of documents required for the purposes of the prosecution, he had given notice to produce documents for the prosecution, and he had actually briefed counsel for the prosecution. In his usual vigorous style Mr. Gill protested that it was "a monstrous condition of affairs"—that the legal adviser of the Bench should also act as the prosecuting solicitor; and, though the language was strong, I fancy it will be generally endorsed. One would think, indeed, that the incompatibilities of such a union of the functions of magistrates' clerk and prosecuting solicitor in the same person would be manifest to everybody concerned in the administration of justice. It transpired, however, that the magistrate's clerk had simply done what was customary in Wiltshire, it being the practice for magistrates' clerks in that county to take charge of police prosecutions, and nobody having hitherto objected to their doing so. Now that the undesirability of the arrangement has been pointed out, it is to be hoped that the authorities will put an end to it.

The ingenious and irrepressible Isaac Gordon has blossomed forth in a new character. Not content with the innumerable aliases which he already possesses, he has now converted himself into "The Midland Loan and Advance Company," under which designation, at 6, Livery-street, Birmingham, or any of his other addresses, he may be relied upon to fleece and ruin anybody who is unfortunate enough to fall into his clutches. One of the latest victims of this bloodsucker was a small farmer who appeared in the Chester Bankruptcy Court last week. He borrowed £30, and paid back £58. 10s., but the usurer still claims £40 more—a fair sample of Isaac's rapacity.

In my Legal Pillory this week illustrations of magisterial lenity in dealing with savage assaults and gross cruelty are, as usual, contrasted with some samples of the harsh and vindictive sentences that are passed for such offences as poaching, vagrancy, and petty larceny. Perhaps the most familiar and conspicuous figures in the list are the Barnsley Bench, who have long borne the palm for exceptionally indulgent treatment of vicious brutes whose drunkenness and violence make them the terror of the neighbourhood. One of these Yahoos is convicted of an outbreak of ruffianism which he wound up with the customary kicking of the policeman who arrested him. It is his twenty-first appearance before the Court, but, nevertheless, he gets off with a paltry pecuniary penalty; while at the same time two men are committed to gaol for nothing more heinous than the so-called crime of sleeping out, "not having any visible means of subsistence." The case from Eccles is noteworthy not only on account of the severity of the punishment, but also because of the extraordinary valuation of the two turnips which the prisoners were charged with stealing. Did the prosecutor swear that these two roots were worth one shilling? If he did, all I can say is that he is a remarkably lucky farmer to be able to grow such turnips. I would also specially direct attention to the Game Law case at Leek. The magistrates who had heard the evidence were equally divided in opinion as to the justice of a conviction, but instead of giving the defendant the benefit of the doubt, they called in another magistrate, and by his vote a penalty of £4 was inflicted:—

Barnsley Police-court. Before Mr. H. Pigott and other magistrates. Abraham Dyson, charged with being drunk and disorderly, and with assaulting a constable. Defendant used filthy language and was very violent, and on being arrested he kicked the officer several times about the legs and body. It was his twenty-first appearance at the Court. Fined 5s. and costs on the first charge, and 20s. and costs for the assault; in default six weeks' imprisonment.

Aberdeen Sheriff-court. Before Hon. Sheriff-substitute D. Duncan. William Robertson pleaded guilty to having assaulted his wife to the effusion of blood. Fined £1.

Doncaster Borough Police-court. James Wragg, charged with assaulting his wife. He seized her by the neck, struck her on the side of the head, and threw her into a corner of the room, afterwards striking her on the arm with a poker, and inflicting a large wound. Fined 10s. and costs.

Macclesfield Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. T. Lockitt, J. Potts, and the Ex-Mayor. Alfred Smith, horse dealer, charged with cruelty to two horses in the fair ground. The animals, which were in poor condition, were tied to a post, and the defendant, who was drunk, unmercifully flogged them with a whalebone whip-stock, marking both on the backs and sides with weals, some of which were two feet long. The Bench characterised it as a very bad case. Fined 40s.

Barnsley Police-court. Before Mr. H. Pigott and other magistrates. John Lee and James Griffiths, charged with sleeping out. Lee fourteen days, Griffiths seven days.

Market Rasen Petty Sessions. Before Rev. W. W. Cooper, Messrs. G. J. Young, J.P., T. Nettleship, and H. W. Marriott. Samuel Ward Rogers, charged with sleeping out. One month.

Peterhead Sheriff-court. Before Sheriff Crawford. John Harvey, charged with poaching. Fined £2. 10s.

Eccles Police-court. Henry Thomason and James Dobson, labourers, charged with stealing two turnips, valued at 1s., from a field belonging to a farmer at Winton. Defendants were seen to throw the turnips back into the field on the approach of the police. Thomason, who had been previously convicted, twenty-one days; Dobson seven days.

Leek Police-court. Before Mr. J. Robinson and other magistrates. James Ward, charged with killing game without a licence. He was seen to take a grouse out of a trap placed on his own land, near some oats. His defence was that he had set some traps under the oats to catch rats. The Bench were equally divided in opinion on the case; but another magistrate was called in from a second court, and the defendant was then convicted and fined £3 and £1 costs.

Dumbarton Police-court. Peter M'Manus, convicted of assaulting his wife on three separate occasions by beating her with his fists, and pulling her about by the hair. Fined 30s.

Alloa Police-court. Before Bailie Grant. Robert Easdale, convicted of assaulting his wife by striking her about the face with his fists, blacking both her eyes and cutting her hand with a piece of crockery. Fined £2. 2s.

Coventry Police-court. Before the Mayor, Messrs. C. J. Hill, J. Maycock, and T. G. Beamish. Edward Wilson, convicted of an unprovoked assault on Richard Muller. Defendant knocked complainant down and kicked him on the lip, rendering him unconscious. Fined 10s. and costs.

Blackburn Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. F. Thomas, W. Boyle, and H. Higson. William Ormerod, charged with assaulting his wife. He went home drunk, struck her in the face with his fist, pulled her out of bed, and dragged her about the room. There were previous convictions. Fined 20s. and costs.

Easingwold Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. Strangwayes, Duncombe, Hawking, Hunter, and Coates. William C. Russell, Herbert Russell, Thomas Russell, and James Maw, charged with assaulting Tom Gibson. Complainant was knocked down and severely assaulted, receiving three wounds upon his head, which bled profusely. Fined £1 each and costs.

Alfreton Police-court. Before Messrs. James Oakes, J. Roberts, and J. Brown. Margaret Lowe, charged with stealing a pair of boots from a pawnshop. One month.

Boston Police-court. Before the Mayor and Mr. F. Harrison. John Smith and Ellen Mooney, charged with sleeping in the open air and being without visible means of subsistence. Twenty-one days each.

Knaresborough Petty Sessions. George Spink, Horace Hutchinson, and Quinton Hutchinson, charged with poaching. Horace Hutchinson fined £2; the others committed for a month each.

Congleton County Police-court. Before Mr. C. W. Hogg, and other magistrates. Walter Bailey, charged with trespassing in pursuit of game. Fined 40s. or one month.

Smallburgh Petty Sessions. Before Mr. George Walker. John Lee, charged with sleeping out. Fourteen days.

Leigh Police-court. Before Messrs. W. Tunnicliffe and R. T. Marsh. Mary A. Buckley, charged with sleeping out. Fourteen days.

Clitheroe Police-court. Joseph States, charged with stealing two boxes, valued at 1s., which he said he took for firewood. One month.

The punishment appears to have fallen on the wrong party in a case at Liverpool Police-court last week, when a driver in the employ of the Liverpool United Tramways and Omnibus Company was fined for working two horses in an unfit state. There was no question as to the cruelty, but the defendant was obliged to drive the horses that were supplied to him or lose his situation, and though he was no doubt technically responsible, a nominal penalty would have met the case so far as he was concerned. The magistrates in their wisdom, however, fined him 19s., though they were informed that besides having thus to bear the sins of the Company, he had been dismissed from their employment. It was asserted that the horses of the Company were generally in very poor condition, and that the local officers of the R.S.P.C.A. were doing all they could to secure an amendment. But for this purpose the punishment of the drivers alone is an absurdity and injustice. The best thing to do would be to get a director of the Company sent to prison, or, failing a director, one of the managers. This course was adopted some time ago in the case of a similar Company in the West of England, and since then I have heard no more complaints respecting the treatment of their horses.

A destitute woman called at Torquay Police-station the other evening and asked for twopence towards the cost of a night's lodging. Instead of directing her to the workhouse, the constable on duty locked the woman up for the night, and on the following morning Colonel Appleton, J.P., committed her to gaol for seven days for the offence of begging alms. This is a fair sample of the pitiless treatment such unfortunate creatures frequently receive in the country, and, in referring to it, a correspondent contrasts the grim attitude of the amateur magistracy towards the poor and distressed, with the sympathy and consideration which London stipendiaries daily exhibit in giving friendly legal advice or pecuniary assistance from the poor-box to deserving applicants. But, of course, nobody in his senses would dream of going to the Great Unpaid for legal advice, while to appeal for relief would be, in nine cases out of ten, a sure way of getting a spell of hard labour. The average Shallow may be benevolent enough in his private capacity; but somehow he seems to be possessed with the wooden-headed idea that his magisterial office requires him to be hard-hearted towards the homeless and the penniless, and there is no crime he is more prompt to punish than the crime of poverty.

A fine uncompromising sort of swindle is being carried on by a man called Berryman, who describes himself as "Agent for Feakes & Co., London, N.E." This man has been regularly advertising for some time past for persons to address envelopes, guaranteeing remuneration of from 6s. 9d. to 8s. per thousand. To those who reply he sends a request for 1s. to cover materials and instructions. When the 1s. is sent, he gives the victim instructions to write to large firms in his neighbourhood, asking them if they want any envelopes addressed. "Large firms," he says, "pay at the rate mentioned in our memo. When you require envelopes, apply to us; we can supply them at from 2s. 3d. to 2s. 9d. per thousand, carriage paid." Berryman is to be found in a house in a dirty little street off London Fields, and I trust it will not be long before the police look in upon him and put a stop to his little game.

The following advertisement relates to a trick very similar to the last mentioned. The advertisement has appeared lately in the People, and other papers:—

HOME SEWING.—Plain, easy work, forwarded through Parcels Post. £1 weekly earned. Persons required anywhere. Patterns and instruction book six stamps.—Wilby, Savile Town, Dewsbury.

Those who send six stamps in reply to this, receive from the said Wilby a small pamphlet entitled "How I make £55 a year by my sewing machine," together with a paper pattern of some garment. On inquiry about the "plain, easy work forwarded through Parcels Post," Wilby replies, "Read the book; it tells you how to dispose of the work per Parcels Post." This impudent trickster evidently thinks that, by forwarding a pamphlet and a paper pattern in accordance with the strict terms of the advertisement, he is keeping on the right side of the law; but I should think there can be no serious doubt that he is disposing of these articles by false pretences. It would seem that with this means of livelihood he combines that of the ordinary advertising quack, for on the inside of the sewing machine pamphlet he advertises himself as a "specialist," and offers for sixpence his book on "Health and Beauty," and various recipes of the class which such quacks deal in.

Despite the recent conviction of one gang of Anglo-Belgian lottery-mongers, the game is not yet at an end. Circulars of the same old kind are now being widely distributed by a "Mr. Reginald Sidney," of 19, Rue Louise, Ostend. Strange to say, these circulars are posted in Bury St. Edmunds. Also, strange to say, there was at Bury St. Edmunds till quite recently an individual named Thomas Wilkins, or Wilkin, doing a large business in the missing-word game. Stranger still, Mr. Reginald Sidney's prospectus is almost word for word identical with that of Thomas Wilkins; while Wilkins's missing-word pools at Bury St. Edmunds have come to an end precisely at the time when "Mr. Sidney's" circulars began to be posted at the same town. I do not wish to jump at conclusions too hastily, but it seems to me that, with these facts before them, the police ought to have no difficulty in putting a stop to Mr. Reginald Sidney's little game.

In response to the request in TRUTH of September 17 for information as to the present whereabouts of Miss Brookes, alias Miss Lane, alias Mrs. Lyle, I have received information that this lady is to be heard of at 65, Fortess-road, Kentish Town. She has had letters sent to that address, and very possibly has been carrying on other swindles under cover of it. No. 65, Fortess-road, is a stationer's shop, kept by a Mr. J. J. Olive, and I have represented to this gentleman that he owes it to his fellow-creatures and the interests of justice to inform the public of the present address of the lady whose correspondence he has taken the responsibility of receiving. Unfortunately, Mr. Olive fails to see this obvious duty, and declines to state where the lady is to be found. Under these circumstances, I can only refer to him those who are at present anxious as to her whereabouts.

There seems some reason to believe that this Mrs. Lyle, or whatever her name may be, is the same swindler who at the beginning of this year was running the "Carlton Society," at 86, Bayswater Mount, Roundhay-road, Leeds, and subsequently at Gledhow-place in the same neighbourhood. She was then going under the name of "N. Lane." The "Carlton Society" was a swindle of the same class as the "Kensington Association" which was lately run by "Miss Brookes" from a bedroom in Acacia-place, St. John's Wood, which she occupied in the name of Miss Lane—that is to say, it was a "society" for the purpose of inducing people to pay subscriptions to Miss Lane on the chance of obtaining prizes in competitions, taking lessons by correspondence, and so on. "N. Lane," the Secretary of the "Carlton Society," is now wanted by the police, and I understand that she has already undergone a conviction. It seems desirable, therefore, that the police should put themselves in communication with Mr. J. J. Olive, who at present possesses the secret of the whereabouts of Miss Lane of the "Kensington Association."

The Rev. E. P. Barrett, of 121, Stockwell Park-road, S.W., whose name has been frequently referred to in TRUTH in connection with the plated goods swindle, has followed the example of so many other gentry of his kind, and is now seeking to hide his identity under the alias of the "Rev. J. Barnett." The Rev. J. Barnett's proceedings bear an even closer resemblance than his name to those of the Rev. E. P. Barrett. He lately swindled a lady by the trick described in TRUTH of June 4 of advertising a "set of the Waverley Novels, consisting of twenty-five magnificent volumes, and admirably bound in calf," and supplying instead a cheap modern edition in imitation binding, worth considerably less than the sum charged. Having brought off this coup, Barrett now sends the lady a price-list of his electro and cutlery goods, writing at the same time:—

> Under very exceptional circumstances, I have the articles mentioned in enclosed for disposal, and should take it as a great favour if you would look through the list, as I am very desirous of turning these things into money at once. The articles are all in perfect order and condition, are all either new or equal to new, are mostly extremely handsome, and could not fail to please. If you choose to purchase any I will let you have them at one half of the reduced prices named.

Of course the goods in question are the shoddy stuff which is disposed of by newspaper advertisements purporting to emanate from ladies, clergymen, and other private individuals anxious to raise cash. Barrett is one of the most active agents of the man Butler, the founder of this trade. His attempt to suggest that he is a clergyman, compelled to dispose of his property by force of circumstances, is distinctly dishonest, and it is high time that the police put a stop to the operations of all engaged in this swindling traffic.

A curious offer is made by some firm through the Yorkshire Post to any lad "wishing to improve his position." It takes the form of a berth as clerk commencing at a salary of £1 a week, and advancing by annual increments in the course of fifteen years to £2 a week, where it stops. If there are many who will jump at this chance of "improving their position," it does not say much for the general position of Yorkshire clerks at present.

Some of the shareholders of the Eastern Telegraph Company are anxious, I understand, to commemorate the services of the late Sir John Pender to submarine telegraphy. I would advise them to be careful that they do not make themselves and the object of their admiration ridiculous. This anybody will certainly do who attempts to place Sir John Pender, Cyrus Field, or any other mere telegraph financier, on the pedestal which properly belongs, not to any capitalist or company promoter, but to the inventors and practical men who developed and worked out the idea—men like the late Sir Charles Bright, Sir Samuel Canning, or Sir William Siemens. We shall hear next that the company-mongers of the Railway Mania ought to be commemorated for their services in the development of our railway system rather than men like the Stephensons and Brunels.

The Government are being favoured with a most extraordinary run of Scotch patronage. A post of £1,000 a year at Edinburgh has just been filled up by Lord Balfour of Burleigh, who now has at his disposal the Sheriffdom of the Lothian and Peebles, the Sheriffdom of Berwick, Roxburgh, and Selkirk, the Sheriff-Clerkship of Lanarkshire, and the Sheriff-Clerkship of Fifeshire, these four offices being worth altogether just £4,450 a year. A furious battle is quietly raging between the Tories and the Liberal-Unionists as to the division of the spoil, and it is the firm conviction of calm observers of the strife that these quarrels as to the distribution of patronage will before long cause a complete split between the two sections of the Ministerial awkward squad in Scotland.

The Secretary for Scotland has perpetrated a most outrageous job by appointing Mr. W. H. Hadow to be Prison Commissioner for Scotland, in the place of Mr. A. B. Bell. The post is worth £1,000 a year, and it was expected at Edinburgh that a professional gentleman, possessed of undeniable qualifications, would be appointed. Lord Balfour of Burleigh has audaciously passed over a dozen highly eligible candidates in order to appoint Mr. Hadow, whose qualifications may be represented by the figures 0 0 0. He has been an energetic Tory wire-puller at Edinburgh and elsewhere, and an indefatigable promoter of Primrose League absurdities; but these valuable services to his Party do not justify his being pitchforked into an important and lucrative office. It is not only Scotch Liberals who are indignant and disgusted, for their sentiments are fully shared by both Tories and Liberal-Unionists.

In order that any current event may yield its full measure of fruit to journalism as practised to-day, there must be something about it which affords an opportunity to the journalistic imagination. Thus, when the Czar came to England, the mere fact of his paying a visit to his wife's grandmother would have been but of minor interest, for very little was to be got out of a train leaving and entering a station, a Czar and his wife driving in a carriage, and a theatrical display of honest Scotch farmers masquerading in kilts, and passing themselves off as a mythical clan in some way connected with the Duke of Fife. The opportunity was, therefore, found in romancing as to what the Czar might say on the Eastern Question, and what the Queen and Lord Salisbury might say to him on the same subject. As the Czar was not accompanied by his Foreign Secretary, and as he seems to be a shy youth, knowing little of politics, but sufficiently intelligent to leave them to his Ministers, it was exceedingly improbable that any communication of importance would take place during his private stay at Balmoral. But to admit this would not have suited journalistic enterprise. Our newspapers had, before his arrival in England, explained to him what he ought to think and say on the matter, and during his stay they each day evolved from their inner consciousness what he had said. Those which did not indulge in this play of fancy, assured us that, having now perceived that the feeling amongst us in regard to the Sultanic atrocities was genuine, he would leave our shores so fully possessed of this knowledge, that the Russian policy would be changed, and that we might count upon him as a supporter of ours. I confess that I could not help asking myself how he would attain this knowledge by shooting stags—or, rather, as it would seem, shooting at stags — in the Highlands, and by embarking for France at Portsmouth, after passing from north to south in a railway saloon carriage.

Journalists were, indeed, fortunate, for on the departure of the Czar Lord Rosebery resigned. Since then the imaginative journalist has had a glorious time. Each day we have had the most wondrous details of what every one of any sort of importance says and thinks on the subject, the names of the communicative sages being for obvious reasons suppressed. What each journalist thinks himself is thus put in the mouth of some "leading member of the Liberal Party, whose name I am not at liberty to disclose." This probably will furnish him with pabulum until some new event provides him with a fresh field for his imagination.

There is a curious instance of special pleading in Lord Rosebery's Edinburgh speech. Turkey, he says, does not belong to us, therefore what right have we to make a present of it to Russia? But who ever suggested that we should do so? What those of us contend, who regard humanity as far above that policy which would consign millions to the misery of Turkish misrule, in order to secure to ourselves influence in a country which does not belong to us, is that we ought not to hinder Russia from bringing that country within the sphere of her political influence, and that, whether it be to our interest or not that the Sultan should exercise sway over subject Christian races, we will not move hand or foot to maintain that sway. The line of demarcation between Lord Rosebery and the Tories, and Mr. Gladstone and the Liberals, is clearly defined. The former would have us adhere to our old iniquitous policy of making the integrity of the Turkish Empire the key-note of our action; the latter would abjure this policy with shame and regret that we have so long practised it. So long as Lord Salisbury and the Turcophiles thought that the agitation on behalf of the Armenians would strengthen their hands, and enable us to perpetuate our influence on the Bosphorus, they encouraged it; but no sooner was the question clearly understood, and people realized that the only means to put an end to Turkish misrule was to give to Russia a free hand, than they belittled the agitation, and did their best to throw cold water on it.

I never have advocated our engaging in a war for the Armenians against the Sultan with Russia at his back, for the plain reason that I failed to see how we could effectively carry on such a war. From the commencement of these Armenian troubles—which have merely drawn attention to the normal misery of the Christian races under Turkish rule—I have always insisted that we, and we alone, were the cause of this misery, and that if only we would leave the matter in the hands of Turkey's neighbour, it would be brought to an end. This view is that which, I think, now prevails amongst Radicals; their duty is to force it on the Government. Unless they do, we shall have a few paper reforms published by the Sultan, and things will revert to the old groove. To every word of Mr. Gladstone's suggestions I adhere, and were Parliament sitting, I would formulate them in a resolution, and submit that resolution to the ordeal of a vote, in order that we might know who are with us and who are against us. Never has the aged veteran of the Liberal Army done a more useful service to the cause of political morality than when at Liverpool he laid down in eloquent words the line of action that we ought to pursue.

THE VIRTUE OF RESIGNATION.

Much had been written pro and con.; this fact, though, still remained—
So false a situation could not be for long maintained.
So rash a climb was bound to be succeeded by a fall:
Well, this same fall, by us foreseen, has come about—that's all!

In other words, the Earl himself, unable, it is clear,
To strive against a strain which had throughout proved too severe,
Has, by his voluntary act, most wisely put an end
To a chaotic state of things 'twas past his power to mend.

He for himself has recognised the truth of what we said
When, by an ill-timed coup d'état, his party first he led.
The scales have fallen from his eyes, and, clearly as can be,
He sees the things which for so long he'd strangely failed to see.

He sees the troops he fain had led, dispersed and disarrayed;
He sees the cause he should have helped, forsaken and betrayed;
He sees his bravest followers in dread disorder thrown;
He sees the foes he should have crushed yet more defiant grown.

He sees that e'en a chief possessed of more consummate skill
Could not, as falsely placed as he, have hoped his post to fill;
Nay, more, that if he would avoid disasters yet more dire
One course alone for him remained—to gracefully retire.

'Tis odd, perhaps, he took so long to recognise what we Were able from the very first so readily to see;
But we would not be hard upon his errors in the past
Now that he manfully has done the proper thing at last.

Nay, let us rather now approve the willingness he's shown
By present firmness for a past of weakness to atone.
The time for stern reproof has gone, now that he spurns no more
The good advice to which he turned so deaf an ear before.

SCRUTATOR.

THE PASSING OF ROSEBERY.

MANY brilliant qualities, as I have often said, Lord Rosebery possesses. But those which go to make the Leader of a great political Party, Providence has not vouchsafed to him. He may know books, but he does not know men; he is nervous and depressed when confronted with difficulties; when he himself sees the goal he does not perceive the mode of attaining it; and the goal itself that he would attain is generally wrapt in mists which prevent others seeing it. It is always "I would," never "I will" with him. But even if all this were not so, he could not well be the Leader of the fierce and aspiring democracy of these isles, for by nature, by habit, and by association he is utterly at variance with it. A man who would drive fat oxen need not himself be fat; but the man who would lead Radicals must himself be a Radical. I have always been surprised that so clever a man ever allowed himself to drift into so false a position as that which Lord Rosebery has occupied since Mr. Gladstone's retirement. I take it that he hoped to create a Rosebery Party, without exactly knowing what the tenets of this Party were to be, beyond that he was to be its Chief, and that its one saving article of faith was to be blind confidence in himself. A sufficient number of Tories, Liberals, and Radicals were to profess this creed and thus to place him above the conflict of existing Parties. All minor differences were to be merged in the term "Roseberyite," though what he or any one else understood by the term I do not quite know. The times are out of joint for such a mentor to dominate a country. Bolingbroke had imagined such a patriot sage. Pitt, and in a lesser degree Palmerston, had to a certain extent embodied in action Bolingbroke's theories. In France it has had for its representatives the two Napoleons.

The General Election of 1891 gave Mr. Gladstone a small and somewhat doubtful majority. His one aim was to pass a Home Rule Bill, and his force as a

THE SANITARY ENGINEERING CO. (Carter Bros.), 65, Victoria-st., Westminster, for making Sanitary Surveys in London or country.

Parliamentarian has always been that he has invariably subordinated everything to one particular issue, until he has succeeded in carrying it. The Conservatives urged in their organs the appointment of Lord Rosebery as Foreign Secretary, because he was even more of an Imperialist than Lord Salisbury. The appointment was made, although no two men ever differed more in regard to our foreign policy than Mr. Gladstone and his Foreign Secretary, in order that our foreign relations might sleep, and thus a clear field be afforded for Home Rule. When Mr. Gladstone resigned the Premiership, Lord Rosebery had in the House of Commons a small but ardent handful of friends, who devotedly intrigued to secure to him the succession. Their efforts, however, would not have succeeded, for most of them were uninfluential nonentities, had it not been that certain of Mr. Gladstone's colleagues suddenly declared that they would not serve under Sir William Harcourt, because, in his zeal for economy as Chancellor of the Exchequer, he had managed to offend their amour propre. To avoid, therefore, a break up of the Cabinet, Lord Rosebery became Prime Minister, although, had the selection been submitted to a meeting of the Liberal M.P.s, there would have been an overwhelming majority for Sir William; in part because he was believed to be a sound Radical; in part because he had fought gallantly during long years of Opposition, whereas Lord Rosebery had taken no part in the fray; in part because little was known either of Lord Rosebery's views, or of his ability to lead; and in part to a strong feeling that a Liberal Premier ought to be in the House of Commons. As Premier, Lord Rosebery disappointed his friends. Relieved from the controlling influence of Mr. Gladstone, he comported himself as an Imperialist with more zeal than discretion, for he one day advanced in order the next day to draw back. Whether he was for Home Rule or not, no one could tell. But he alienated those who were for it by announcing that it ought not to be carried by a majority in the House of Commons, unless there were also an English majority for it. In regard to the House of Lords, his utterances were even more ambiguous. He wished, he said, to reform the Lords, and without altering the composition of that Chamber, to make it a barrier against the will of the people as set forth by their elected representatives. How this was to be done he did not make clear, but, as he announced that his reforms were only to be carried into effect with the consent of the Lords themselves, it is evident that they would not have been of a very drastic character.

In his valedictory speech at Edinburgh last Friday, Lord Rosebery complains that the Liberal Party would not follow him, and that the position of a Leader without possessing the confidence of his followers is intolerable. I have no doubt that as Leader of the Liberal Party he was not on a bed of roses. But he should have remembered that he had become the Leader without the Party having been consulted, that he showed no special gift for leading, but rather the reverse, and that he was himself in direct antagonism to most of the traditions and the aspirations of the Radicals who are now the predominant partners in the Party. His view seems to have been that the policy of the Party was to be decided by him, and that the Party was to hear and to obey. The Radical view is that the Party collectively adopts principles, and that the only mission of the Leader is to give effect to them. The Party is the captain of the ship, the Leader is the man at the wheel who steers as the captain directs.

Difficult as the position was when Lord Rosebery was Premier, it became more difficult with him as Leader of the Liberal Party in opposition. This, as Lord Rosebery has himself explained, is the necessary consequence of the Leader not being in the House of Commons. During the last session his existence was absolutely ignored in the House of Commons, not only by the rank and file of the Party, but by his late colleagues. When the latter held private councils as to their course of action, he was not invited to consult with them. Some of them were hostile to any idea of his continued leadership, others, although they recognized that this leadership had proved a fatal mistake, held aloof from all expression of opinion, as they wished to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds, until the event proved whether hare or hounds would have the disposal of office when the Liberal Party returned to power. Occasionally he made a speech in the Provinces, but these speeches attracted little attention. I am not, therefore, surprised that he has thrown up the sponge: The position, in fact, was untenable for a self-respecting man.

I gather from Lord Rosebery's speech at Edinburgh that the decision was taken rather from a general consideration of his position than from any great divergency of view with Mr. Gladstone and other Liberals on the Armenian question, although it was perhaps precipitated by this divergency. Mr. Gladstone has said that he does not urge that we should engage in a crusade against all Europe in order to secure good government in Turkey. His view is that we have been the mainstay of the integrity of that Empire, and that we should announce that we will be so no longer, but that if Turkey's neighbours wish to put an end to that rule, we will in no way interfere with them. Lord Rosebery's opinion is that we have so direct an interest in the maintenance of Turkish integrity that we claim that no attack should be made upon it by any Continental Power—but that we are ready to act in concert with Europe to reform the government of the Sultan. Mr. Gladstone has always been for this European concert. He is against it now, because he realises that we and the rest of Europe are not at one as to interference, and that consequently such concert merely means giving the Sultan a free hand to misgovern. In his remarks on our foreign policy, Lord Rosebery fell into a curious contradiction. Our foreign policy, he said, is to be above Party, i.e., whoever is Foreign Secretary ought to be left a perfectly free hand to do as he pleases. But later on in his speech, he expressed approval of Mr. Gladstone having put himself at the head of an agitation against the Government of Lord Salisbury, when the Bulgarian atrocities took place and Russia interfered to put an end to them.

At Edinburgh Lord Rosebery alluded to Mr. Asquith as his successor, and Mr. Asquith responded to the compliment by urging his lordship to withdraw his resignation, and assured him, if he did so, of the united support of the Liberal Party. A similar advice and a similar assurance is, I see, given by some of the Liberal newspapers that have distinguished themselves by their subservient laudation of the late Premier, whilst the Tory organs, one and all, who only a few days ago were denouncing him as a hopeless idiot, now tell us that we ought to implore him on our knees to become once more our Leader, as he is the only Liberal in whom they have a vestige of confidence. All this is nonsense. Many Liberals accepted Lord Rosebery's nominal leadership as a dire necessity, and felt disposed to leave the future to deal with it, rather than provoke a crisis by overt action. But if the Parliamentary Liberals were called together to-morrow Lord Rosebery would have as little chance of being elected Liberal Leader as Sir Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett. With us Radicals, who have always protested against his leadership, it is no question of personal antipathy. We wish Lord Rosebery all prosperity and happiness, but we believe, as we always have believed, that Democracy is cabined, cribbed, and confined by having as its head a great nobleman, without much Parliamentary experience, without any very definite opinions, and without a grim determination to trample under foot everything that stands in the way of Democratic advance. With us the future of Democracy is involved in this question of the leadership, and there is room for no compromise. Lord Rosebery has himself recognised that, with his political views, and with the impossibility of his being in the House of Commons, his leadership of our Party is impossible. I respect him for the frankness with which he has admitted this, and for his having, without consulting the toadies and waiters on Providence who had pinned their hopes of personal advancement on his continued leadership, acted upon a decision which does honour to his common sense and to his self-respect. "The honourable gentleman," said Mr. Disraeli once in the House of Commons, in answer to Mr. Bright, "cannot, say what he may, prevent me from having had the honour of having been Prime Minister." This proud position Lord Rosebery has held. It may be that he will once again hold it, but, if so, it will be not as Leader of the Radicals, but as Leader of a Party formed by a union of Conservatives and Whigs, with a common bond of action in resistance to that absolute and entire rule of the people by the people, which is involved in that blessed word, Democracy. The Earl of Warwick was the last of the Barons, and sincerely do I trust, in the interest of all those sweeping reforms that Radicals deem needful for the welfare of the community, that the Earl of Rosebery, clever and well-meaning as he may be, will be the last of the Dukes, Marquises, Earls, Viscounts, and Barons, under whose leadership Radicals will allow themselves to be led to perdition.

In the Liberal Party, and especially in the Party as represented in the House of Commons, there are a considerable number of gentlemen who can hardly be called Radicals. Some of them have entered Parliament with a view to grinding their own axes, and they perch themselves on a fence, ready to come down either on the Moderate Liberal or on the Radical side, as each may in their estimate furnish the best ground. Amongst these you have the lawyer who wants to be a Judge—County Court if nothing better can be obtained—the very rich man who would be a Peer, the man who thinks that he ought at least to be made a Knight, the man who is desirous to obtain some sort of social recognition by being invited to the omnium-gatherums of the party entertainers; the man who hopes that he will become a paid deputy-mop-squeezer in a Liberal Administration, and the man in whom is strongly developed that essentially British malady of servile respect to all the Lord Tom Noddies that constitute "Society." Others there are, who are really Conservative in heart, and who have a sneaking love for all these political privileges that are the bane of our present Constitution. All these different categories are loud-mouthed at elections in the profession of the most ultra-democratic sentiments, but, now on this ground, now on another, they find means to evade voting on the side of their profession, or, if they do so, they look to something occurring to prevent the vote being anything beyond a pious opinion which is to have no practical result. To all these gentlemen a Leadership such as that of Lord Rosebery was a perfect godsend. They thought themselves safe from the realisation of their electoral promises, they hoped that the Liberal Party might possibly get once again into office by their opponents making mistakes, and by that "swing of the pendulum" which is the sheet anchor of the wire-pullers; and they expected that their personal advocacy of the man might be the casting of bread upon the waters, for which the man would in the fulness of time reward them. Now all this was very well when politics were but a faction fight for the spoil between two rival gangs. But, unfortunately for such calculations, amongst the large portion of the electorate, who care for neither of the gangs, it was not calculated to arouse enthusiasm, and my conviction is that it either would have ended in a Conservative majority at the next General Election, or in a victory by which Democracy would have gained nothing. At present, sincere Radicals have once again a chance to put an end to this barren folly. They must have a programme, and a drastic one, and they must take care that they are not jockeyed out of it by false friends and by private axe-grinders. With such a programme, it is possible that we may for a time be defeated, but at least we shall have something worth fighting for, and if we do achieve success, that success will mean something more than a shower of titles, and the noses of one gang replacing those of another gang in the public manger.

There can be no question as to Lord Rosebery's successor. Sir William Harcourt is the Liberal Leader in the House of Commons, and well and ably has he fought the battles of the Opposition. As a Parliamentarian he is head and shoulders above the other occupants of the front Opposition bench. This, I am convinced, is the view entertained by nine-tenths of the Liberal and Radical M.P.s. I see that Mr. Spence Watson has summoned a meeting of the National Liberal Federation, and that Mr. Evans, the Vice-President of the Association, has informed the Press that every Liberal Association throughout the country was true to Lord Rosebery. Apparently he arrives at this conclusion because no Association had informed the Association that it was not. The National Liberal Association is extinct as a factor in the Liberal Party. In times gone by it was an independent body, fairly representing Liberal thought. Of late it has been a sort of annexe to the wirepulling clique that affected to direct matters in Parliament-street with the same habitat and the same officials. The resolutions at its meetings were submitted to it ready-made, and no amendments were allowed. The delegates attending these meetings were in the main the selections of the subordinate local wirepullers, acting under the directions of Parliament-street. The few who were independent were perforce obliged to hold their tongues. This scheme of two persons in one and one in two, both the one and the two being the cleverest of wirepullers, disgusted the Radicals throughout the country, and no one cares one brass farthing what the National Liberal Federation may say or do upon any question.

I have a high opinion of Mr. Asquith, and I regard him as a most useful member of the Liberal Party. But I hardly see why he should be made the Leader of the Party because Lord Rosebery has recommended it. When Elijah went up to heaven, his mantle descended on Elisha, who was thus designated by the old prophet as his successor. But Lord Rosebery has not left us in a chariot of fire for Paradise. He remains with us, and possibly he contemplates again leading us. Mr. Asquith's selection has, therefore, a good deal too much of the warming-pan about it to be a suitable one. However, it is useless discussing it, for beyond a few Press men, and possibly a few of the little clique that intrigued for Lord Rosebery succeeding Mr. Gladstone, I doubt if it is deemed by any one within the area of practical politics.

PREMPEH IN PRISON.

The Daily Telegraph in a recent issue informed the British nation "that the deposed Ashanti monarch, Prempeh, has settled down quietly into the comparative retirement into which circumstances drove him, and is giving the British authorities no trouble." "The comparative retirement into which circumstances drove him" is good. A competent witness on the spot, whose statement is before me, asserts that "the King and his followers (including women) are confined in two rooms, measuring about 12 ft. square, in which all have to sleep indiscriminately without any provision for privacy or even decency." Imagine some superior authority, who disapproved of the manner in which the Daily Telegraph is conducted, marching down to Peterborough Court with a force of infantry and artillery, removing the editor and his staff to Holloway Gaol, and locking them up there with their female belongings, in a couple of apartments 12 ft. square, and you have a very close parallel to "the comparative retirement into which circumstances drove" the deposed Ashanti monarch. Were a subsequent issue of the Daily Telegraph to announce that the deposed editor was "settling down quietly" in his "comparative retirement," and "giving the authorities no trouble," it strikes me that my worthy contemporary would regard such expressions as ill-timed sarcasm. Anyhow, if he acquiesced cheerfully in the situation, he would be more of a philosopher than poor old Prempeh.

If the Daily Telegraph, or any one else, intends to suggest that Prempeh is in any way reconciled to his present position, the suggestion is absolutely false. The captive monarch has "settled down" to precisely the extent which any other prisoner settles down when clapped into gaol, but no more; and it is high time, notwithstanding the many sensational questions now occupying the Press, that the country gave some thought to his position and to his future treatment. Prempeh himself has put a forcible protest on record in the shape of a "humble petition," which he addressed to Mr. Chamberlain in July. A copy of this petition I have received through the instrumentality of Mr. Michael Davitt, who interested himself in the case of the Ashanti prisoners last session; and the document, although formally addressed to the Colonial Secretary, concerns the whole country, and ought to be publicly noticed. The case that Prempeh puts forward may be thus summarised:—

1. That in 1888 he was placed in the presence of British Commissioners on "the stool of his ancestors."

2. That from that day onwards he maintained friendly relations with the British Government until the beginning of the present year.

3. That since 1892 he has been in negotiation with the Government with the view of bringing himself and his dominions under the Queen's protection.

4. That for the purpose of furthering these negotiations he in the present year sent envoys to England.

5. That these envoys were officially informed that an expedition was about to be despatched to Coomassie, tha tBritish officers would accompany them back, and that if the King "offered no resistance the matter would be settled peaceably."

6. That the commissioners on their return informed him (Prempeh) that he was required to send three principal Chiefs to Prahsu to meet the Governor of the Gold Coast, make submission, and accept the British terms; and also to send two hostages for the observance of these terms, accept a British Resident, give a piece of land for the erection of a Residency, and pay the costs of the expedition.

7. That he thereupon sent the Chief, as required, to make full submission and accept the British terms, and also sent "two Princes of the Blood Royal," to be held by her Majesty's Government as hostages.

8. That all the persons so sent returned at the end of a week, and reported that Captain Donald Stewart informed them that the expedition would come to Coomassie in any event.

9. That he (Prempeh) next sent back the deputies and hostages, who returned reporting that they had been turned back and ill-treated by the British.

10. That he then despatched Prince Albert Ansah with a letter to Captain Donald Stewart, stating that he was prepared to accept all the terms notified by the Governor, and that he "had made proclamation throughout his territory that all weapons should be removed to the interior, and that no resistance should be offered to the expedition."

The petition then recites the arrival of the expedition and the Governor, and the incident of the monarch's submission "by removing his head-gear and sandals, and lowering his cloth, and by kneeling at his Excellency's feet." Then comes the following account of the circumstances of his removal and imprisonment:—

14. His Excellency then demanded the immediate payment of the balance of the indemnity imposed by the Treaty of Tomana of 1874, and of the expenses of the present expedition. Your petitioner replied that he was not prepared to pay such an amount at once, but offered such gold as he had in hand, amounting to 300 peregwins, equal to £2,670, and to pay the balance in one week, if time were allowed, and to give two hostages as security for the payment thereof.

15. His Excellency refused this proposition, and your petitioner with his mother, her husband, Kwesi Jembibi, Chiefs Ajiman, Asafu Bwatchi, Amankwetsu, and Subirri, all Princes of the Blood Royal; Apia, King of Mampon; Apia, Chief of Ofisu; Afranin, King of Ejisu; Ejakun, Head of the Royal Tribe; Akwaku, Chief Linguist; Kwaku Aurisu, Second Linguist; Bwatchi Atonsu, Captain of the Royal Body-guard, were made prisoners and subsequently brought to the coast under the guard of the British troops and lodged in the Fort St. George d'Elmina, where they now are.

16. Your petitioner begs to represent that he has offered no resistance to her Majesty's troops, has accepted the terms put forward by her Majesty's representative, and that he is prepared to pay the indemnity if allowed a reasonable time to collect the amount, but that he cannot arrange for the payment unless he is given opportunity to meet his Chiefs, which he cannot do as long as he is detained a prisoner.

That this petition recites the whole truth and nothing but the truth I should be sorry to assert. Although holding the opinion that the late expedition to Coomassie was a stupid and uncalled-for proceeding—except from the point of view of the various colonial and military officials who have profited by it—I do not shut my eyes to the fact that the British Government had certain grounds of complaint against Prempeh, which are ingeniously slurred over in the captive monarch's pleading. But treating the petition as an ex parte statement, certain points in it are beyond controversy. The chief of these is that the Ashanti King never from first to last manifested the slightest disposition to offer any forcible resistance to our demands on him. On the contrary, he sent his envoys to England with full power to concede everything reasonable, and they were treated as impostors. He met the advancing expedition with the fullest offers of submission, and never made the slightest show of resistance; but the force, nevertheless, pushed on to his capital and there inflicted upon him a humiliation, which could not have been more abject had he offered every conceivable defiance and insult to her Britannic Majesty and her Government. If it be true that the letter notifying his proclamation against the use of arms was delivered to the British Commander—and Prempeh states that his messengers informed him that the letter was duly delivered—the expedition is revealed in a more ridiculous light than ever before. Here we have it solemnly asserted by the sovereign on whom we were supposed to be making war, that he issued a Royal proclamation to his subjects to offer no resistance; and in order to make sure that no possible violence should be offered to the invader, actually ordered all arms to be sent into the interior. The British commander may have distrusted this statement, or may have preferred not to believe it. But the facts remain that Prempeh had up to that time done everything a monarch in his position could to declare his full submission; and, what is of more importance, that no resistance of any kind was ever offered to the British force from the time it started till the time it returned. I believe I am correct in stating that in the whole "campaign" not a shot was ever fired or a hostile force seen; and all the circumstances, therefore, tend to confirm Prempeh's statement that his subjects had been disarmed on the approach of the expedition. A more ignominious farce was never perpetrated in the guise of a military operation; and though no one questions that all ranks of the force did such duty as was required of them with loyalty and devotion, the distribution of honours and decorations for such service is calculated to deprive such rewards of all value in the eyes of soldiers who know what fighting is. Well may the men who have waited in vain for official recognition of their valour and sufferings in such arduous operations as those against the Kachin tribes in 1892-3, gnash their teeth over such a prostitution of military honours as the Ashanti decoration!

The other point brought out by Prempeh's petition is this: that the ostensible ground for making him prisoner and deporting him from the country after he had made submission was his failure to meet at once the demand for an indemnity; and that this course puts it entirely out of his power to comply with the demand. The official justification of the course taken will be, I suppose, that the King's professions of inability to meet the demand made were not believed; that he was supposed to possess treasure somewhere in concealment; and that it was expected that a term of imprisonment would cause the production of the cash—the same argument in effect as is applied in the County Courts, when a committal order is made against a judgment debtor who can pay and won't. But even in the County Courts, where procedure is often free and easy enough, some sort of "proof of means" is required before the committal order is made. The hastiest County Court Judge would hardly consign a debtor to gaol on the mere suspicion of the creditor that the defaulter had buried a bag of sovereigns somewhere in his back garden. What ground was there for suspecting that Prempeh had concealed treasure somewhere? Does that ground still exist? And is there any longer reasonable cause for supposing that imprisonment will cause the captive to disgorge? In the same paragraph from the Daily Telegraph from which I have quoted above occurs the following timely information:—

The impression that the ex-King had concealed the bulk of his wealth before the arrival of the Special Service Corps at Coomassie no longer prevails, and the Government officials believe that the collection which has been on view in this country comprised the whole of the so-called "treasure."

Very well. Then "the Government officials" have imprisoned Prempeh on false pretences, and they owe it to him and to the honour of the country to release him without further delay. Whether they ever had any reasonable ground for suspecting that Prempeh had "concealed the bulk of his wealth," is, I should say, doubtful. The equivalent of £2,670 sterling, which the ex-King says he offered to pay down upon the spot, is a fairly substantial sum for an African backwood potentate to have in his possession, and I question whether his name on a cheque or a bill would have been considered good for even that amount in the City of London. If he only asked Sir William Maxwell for a week's credit, undertook to pay the indemity by that time, and offered respectable security for the payment—the British forces at that time holding his capital and his person at their mercy—it seems to me that his request was a reasonable one, which any civilised Power ought to have granted, and that his deportation and imprisonment on the mere suspicion of having concealed some of his assets were utterly unjustifiable from the first. By the way, it is alleged by those in Cape Coast Colony who have interested themselves on Prempeh's behalf that in the search for buried treasure the Royal graves were dug up, the bodies in them desecrated, and such valuables as they contained appropriated. If this was done, it was a gross outrage, dishonourable to all who authorised or took part in it, and indirectly reflecting a stain upon all of us. I trust that Sir William Maxwell and Sir Francis Scott, who are both, I believe, still in England, will be able to give some full and satisfactory denial of the story, and I shall be happy to assist in publishing the denial. But the fact that Prempeh was suspected of having concealed vast stores of wealth, and that this wealth has been searched for in vain, coupled with the exhibition aforesaid of loot in the shape of Ashanti valuables and antiquities, give sufficient colour to the allegation to entitle it to notice.

Very possibly Prempeh is not an ideal monarch, nor in all respects estimable as a man. "Stories, I know, are told not to his credit." Kings are, as a rule, unfavourable specimens of humanity; and an African King, living near enough to civilisation to have acquired many of our vices and to have formed a contempt for our virtues, is not likely to be an exceptionally attractive representative of Royalty. But there are certain rules of fair and honourable dealing which ought to be observed, even in our relations with African kings, and there are certain duties and considerations to be observed in all the dealings of a strong, civilised nation with a weak and barbarous one. It seems to me that Prempeh has been dealt with neither fairly nor considerately, and that our "prancing proconsuls," for their own honour and glory, have manufactured empty pretexts for subjugating him and his people. If all that is now required of him is money, it is clear that he cannot raise that money in a dungeon on the Gold Coast. He ought to be given, under proper security, a reasonable opportunity of putting himself in funds. If, on the other hand, the money is a mere pretext for deposing him in the British interest, he ought to be provided for properly, and not caged up with his household and relatives, male and female, in a couple of apartments—whether measuring 12 ft. square, or more. We have enough sins against African monarchs on our hands and consciences, without adding this.

DR. FOLEY FINDS HIS TONGUE.

On September 17, I published a full statement of a disgraceful case, in which a so-called "Dr." Foley, practising as a dentist in Westbourne-grove and other places, had charged a domestic servant £126 for two sets of artificial teeth supplied to her, and incidental work connected with fitting them. In a letter that I have now received from him, this Foley informs me that he has read my remarks "with astonishment." His astonishment must have stricken him dumb, for not till October 7—three weeks after the appearance of the article—did he sit down to write his reply. As I have quite made up my mind about this individual, I do not intend to waste my time and my readers' by going over the case again at any length. The only passage in his letter which I consider worth notice is the following:—

> In common fairness to myself I must ask you to give this explanation the same publicity you did the previous malicious mis-statements about myself and practice. This will allow the readers of your paper to form an opinion of the "Truth" of your article, and let them see how valuable your information is when distorted by you. Unless you do this and withdraw the offensive and malicious remarks you have made about me, I shall have no alternative but to proceed as advised.

It is a pity that Mr. Foley did not take advice as to how to proceed before he wrote me this letter. He makes certain statements in this document in defence or excuse for his charge of £126 for supplying two sets of teeth to this misguided cook. He says that the woman herself ordered two sets, that he did not know she was a servant until her employer called on him to refund the money, that she herself desired that each "case" (of which he had told her it would be necessary for her to have five) should be made in gold, that "the case was an exceptional one, requiring special treatment," and so on. That there might be no mistake about it, I have submitted this letter to the woman herself, and she absolutely denies all Foley's allegations, so far as they come within her personal knowledge. I have not the slightest doubt that she is speaking the truth, and I should not dream of accepting Foley's statement in opposition to her evidence. In this attitude I am fortified by what passed on the occasion when a representative of Mr. Foley waited on the cook's present employer, in response to the demand which had been made for a return of the money, under threat of legal proceedings. At this interview a third gentleman was present, who concurs in the account given me of what passed. The admissions of Foley's representative on this occasion are directly at variance with what Foley now asks me to believe, and the promise to refund £40 was made after it had been represented to him that dental experts had pronounced the charges monstrous, and without any reference whatever to the patient's means.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Foley's letter to me is obviously a tissue of fictions, and his impudence in writing as he does only aggravates his conduct throughout the case. Whether the "case was an exceptional one requiring exceptional treatment," is a technical question as to which I profess to know nothing. All I say is that the attempt to extort £126 out of a poor and ignorant woman was a downright swindle. If "Dr." Foley thinks that he can convince a jury to the contrary, I shall be very pleased to uphold my opinion whenever called upon, and Mortlock's China and Glass Business, Oxford-st., has entered its 150th year, being founded by John Mortlock in 1746. It is carried on by John George Mortlock, the great-great grandson of the founder, who solicits patronage and recommendation.

Messrs. Lewis & Lewis, of Ely-place, will answer on my behalf any further communications he may have to make. But until a jury has decided that he was justified in attempting to obtain this money, I shall not withdraw a word that I have said about the case.

"ROSEMARY."

Charles Wyndham's performance of the love-sick bachelor in "Rosemary" is one of the very best things of the kind that has been seen on the English stage for over a quarter of a century. I am not exaggerating at all when I deliberately say this. But I must preface what I intend to say on this point with one material suggestion. To me it seems that the performance is infinitely and incomparably better now than it was at the outset. Charles Wyndham was ill, nervous, harassed, and overworked when "Rosemary" was first produced. It was then the brilliant effort of a tired man. And to add to the difficulty, the last act—far too long at the outset—clogged the play. No one in the wide world wanted to see Charles Wyndham play an old man. It was hateful to the majority. He is young, and ever must be young, like the late Alfred Montgomery. But if the necessities of art required Charles Wyndham to be an old man, then the less of the old man the better. Critical hints on the first performance have been sensibly adopted, and we see as little of the senile Sir Jasper as possible. "All's well that ends well," and the delightful play "Rosemary" ends now as a dramatic poem should end, gracefully and with effect. But Charles Wyndham, invigorated with the mountain air of the Engadine and Scotland, is a different Charles Wyndham altogether from the Charles Wyndham who first created Jasper Thorndyke.

As played now at the Criterion, the performance is one of the most human, real, pathetic, and natural that the playgoer of present or past has seen. I speak by the card. Charles Wyndham in his various moods and periods has been compared to two great actors, two of the very best that the English stage has seen in the last half century. I allude to Charles Mathews and the elder Sothern—Edward Askew Sothern. The comparison was not at all inapt. Charles Wyndham in his first, early farce period had much of the mercurial spirits and intense vivacity of Charles Mathews. He possessed what Charles Mathews possessed—charm, grace, and a winning personality. The delight of the style of Charles Mathews can only be described in the words of the old playgoer, who saw him act one night and heard as he went out of the house that the reckless, delightful, devil-me-care actor had been declared a bankrupt. "That man a bankrupt!' observed the fine old playgoer. "Then it is a disgrace to England that she does not pay his debts." Such was the personal charm of Charles Mathews. Charles Wyndham possesses it all. I think his humour is more pronounced than that of his predecessor. Again, Charles Wyndham has been compared to the elder Sothern. The comparison is a natural one. I have seen and criticised all these actors, and I have a right to give an opinion upon them.

But Charles Mathews and Edward Sothern possessed a common failing. They could not touch the heart. No man or woman living ever shed a tear over the brilliant acting of Charles Mathews. It was the passion of Sothern's life to be considered a romantic actor, a kind of English Fechter, but he failed again and again. In romance he was hard, wooden, often ludicrous. His humour was delightful; his pathos execrable. He had every advantage in his favour, youth, good looks, a gallant bearing, every gift that Nature could give him. He was a lady-killer, but he could not make love—on the stage. His last act of "David Garrick," and the scene with Ada Ingot, left me with dry eyes, and I am a sympathetic audience in myself. My test of sympathetic acting is myself. I am the barometer. If the weather is set fair, or stormy, or much rain on the stage, it is registered on this piece of wood, mercury, and glass. When Charles Wyndham played David Garrick, he very nearly reached the pathetic stop—but not quite. It is the most difficult thing in the world to separate the pathetic situation from the pathetic actor. At a pathetic situation many an audience weeps, but the genuine tears come with the pathetic actor. At last, Charles Wyndham has touched the human heart. He came very near it in David Garrick—very near it, indeed, but did not quite reach it on the first night of "Rosemary." But now it has come full flood. There is no doubt about it, Charles Wyndham's scene of resignation, his duty scene of abandonment and honour with the frivolous little heartless coquette who has enslaved him, is the finest and most human scene enacted on the stage since Fechter played "Ruy Blas." "Hang your Frenchman!" some one will say. "Quote us an Englishman as a comparison." I will do so. Leigh Murray in the "Marble Heart." Wyndham is as fine in pathos and in art as Leigh Murray was as the love-sick, heart-broken sculptor in the "Marble Heart." I can give him no greater compliment. In accent, in tone, in human sympathy, and in nature, the English stage has seen few more beautiful things than Sir Jasper Thorndyke as now played at the Criterion. I ask myself if I am right, and cudgel my brains and memory. The Sidney Carton of John Clayton in "All for Her"—very beautiful. The George d'Alroy of Fred Younge—the original in "Caste"—an exquisite performance, indeed. But I throw in my vote for the Jasper Thorndyke of Charles Wyndham, for I have seen all these men, criticised all these performances, and am doubtless scorned and execrated as a mere laudator temporis acti. What nonsense! As if a Sarah Bernhardt cannot be as great as a Rachel! As if an Ellen Terry cannot outrun and out-match a Mrs. Jordan or a Peg Woffington! As if a Henry Irving has not done things greater and more artistic than a David Garrick or a Kean! As if Charles Wyndham cannot be a Mathews, Sothern, and Leigh Murray thrown into one! There is no past in dramatic art. It is all present and future. But those who have seen the past will not accept the present at its own valuation. They want the guarantee of their own experience.

The mere excellence of Charles Wyndham's Sir Jasper absolutely puts the play out of balance. We who watch the scenes cannot conceive how a middle-aged bachelor who thinks, who dreams, who has studied women, can be caught by the mere beauty and innocence of a heartless and brainless little baggage. What is there in this silly little girl that would attract so deeply-thinking and observant a man? Possibly Nature will answer, Yes; such things do occur—they occur daily. Mere physical charm will upset the applecart of an Anthony, an Alexander, a Dante, or a Merlin. Be this as it may, the little English girl of the early nineteenth century could not have been more charmingly played than by Miss Mary Moore. She was, and is, delightful. She may have her views about the Anthonys and the Merlins, and her experience of life and its varieties, but she follows the authors' intentions to the very letter, and it is one of the best things this pretty actress has ever done. Nor should Mr. Jack Barnes be dismissed without praise. The old Professor is a fine, manly performance; in fact, "Rosemary" should not be missed. It is the best play, as a play simple and as an acted play, now to be seen in London.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE RICHEST MAN ON EARTH.

As the uncontrolled master of the Russian Treasury, the Czar is the richest man on earth. He rules a greater extent of territory than any other Sovereign. No other Court than his can show as much archaic or modern splendour. His army is actually, and his navy is becoming, the biggest that there is. As an international arbiter he becomes like the pointsman of a great railway junction. The inconsistencies and incongruities of his vast Facing-both-ways-Empire are harmonised by his absolute power. As Czar he is a perpetual Court of Appeal to the endless provinces and peoples under him. The Little Father can with a word right the wrongs his great administrative machine inflicts on them. The Czar directs the wills of nearly a hundred millions of Orthodox subjects. The whole moral force of the Greek Church in Russia is his to command. He is subject to the laws of nature, but art and science are constantly helping him to turn them. Were his baby to cry for the moon, opticians and astronomers could be used to bring it nearer to her. No human creature ever bore a greater weight of responsibility, national and international. The load is such that one might imagine he required the hearty spirits of a Jupiter, the resource of a Mercury, the callousness of a Saturn, and the broad shoulders of an Atlas to bear up against it.

Fancy our astonishment at seeing the Czar face to face, with a few millions of voluntary subjects about him; and these subjects, too, the heirs of all the ages, and the fine flower of Greek, Latin, and Christian civilisation! They had been suggestionised into subjection, just as Pan suggestionised armies to run away. The influences that brought them into a paroxysm of self-renouncement were various. Among them were—a rage to recover Alsace-Lorraine; a rage to be quits with Germany, which had grown too overbearing; and a rage to expand in Africa, Tonquin, and other outlandish places. But, more than anything else, there was this hidden reason: the Russian alliance was in 1891-92 the last card of Panama, and the discredited Panamists played it boldly and adroitly, and succeeded.

A friend writes from England:—"My eyes glitter with envy when I think how much you have seen of the most interesting pageant of modern history." My feeling was one of wonder at human nature. The "what went ye out for to see?" of the greatest and shrewdest Idealist, who had seen the Czardom of Tiberius, constantly rang in my mind. There was so very little in the outriders' carriages and four, the finery of the ladies, the uniforms and gold lace of courtiers and diplomats, who had eaten and drank too much, gambled too much, tricked too much, and kow-towed all their lives. What redeemed the show was the Czar and Czarina. But they did so in a way that nobody expected, and few valued. Long before the three days were over, I was ready to cry "Illah Allah," for there is no greatness to speak of short of Allah.

It will help your fancy to hear what manner of man the Czar is, and what a foil he had in M. Faure. The President stood between Nicholas and Alexandra as they descended from the palace on wheels at Passy railway to drive through Paris. The excellent President is pompous, portly, scrupulously attentive to externals, self-satisfied, likes to be thought a Lord Bountiful, and has lots of "side." The Czar has just body enough to maintain and sheathe a high-strung nervous system. One can hardly realise that he is he, so modest, quiet, and unaffected is his bearing. He is refined without being finical, delicate without effeminacy. Though extremely impressionable and emotional, he behaves like a man of a cold nature, and keeps under all circumstances a level head. Greek artists, orators, writers understood the beauty of restraint. This is a virtue that has become a second nature to the Czar. A French officer of his following, used to more demonstrative manners, thought he was made of ice. His rare smiles, he said, were pale and chill as polar sunbeams.

I do not share this opinion, and one way or another I saw a good deal of Czar and Czarina. French taste has been spoiled by the assumption by their chic people of the inflation, bounce, stagey panache of their public men. Spaniards would have felt the Czar's good form. Much of it was induced of course by education, but it seemed natural, and I thought, sweet as a field flower. It was modesty itself, unalloyed with shyness, and one thought the disposition must be obliging. Impossible to be more affable in an easy, quiet, thoughtful way. A pair of candid, kindly blue eyes bring him at once into touch with those who meet his gaze. They are full eyes, and a little like those of Alexander II., but do not, like Alexander's, express a mournful sense of solitude. The under-part of the face, however, shows the habit of reticence. The Czar's impressionable nerves are seldom without the curb. But he cannot when stirred prevent the nervous centres suddenly drawing to themselves all the blood in his body; this makes his pallor striking, and brings on a state that ought to, but does not, make him quiver all over like a strongly excited thorough-bred horse. Doctors might say from this that he is a case. He is not. One detects no morbidness. His cool, collected manner excludes the idea that he is morbid. I should say he has good sense, ability to bend his mind to toil, and cleverness. The mutin nose gives the face a charming finish, quite unexpected in an autocrat. The Czar in mind and body takes after the Holsteins, who, since Peter II. and Catherine II. (first cousins), were five times in his genealogy. One sees a touch of this mutin nose in the otherwise Greek profile of Catherine; Paul I. had it to a caricatural degree; there is a trace of it in the King of Denmark, and its accentuation is one of the charms of his daughter, Marie Feodorovna. The French say it gives him an espiègle expression. A danseuse who figured in the pavane danced before their Imperial Majesties at Versailles, called the Czar's nose un petit nez polisson, by which she meant a darling little saucy nose.

I have spoken of the look of loneliness that gave a pathetic interest to Alexander II. One would have said that he never knew what it was to have a friend. The annual sojourn of the Czar at Fredensborg provided him any number of companions of his own rank and breeding. The Greece-Wales-Denmark-Cumberland cousins are now so many tribes of personal friends. The Czar seems to have had a heart as well as a head education, and to have plenty of human nature. Moreover, I imagine that he values most the heart-side of life. If I am not mistaken, he has already learned that Imperial station is not a bed of roses.

This French visit must influence the future life of the Imperial pair. The Czar is a great reader of French novels, plays, and essays, and prefers French pictorial art to any other. But he had not time to visit studios or show connoisseurship unless in his rush round the Louvre. The French showed the Emperor and Empress their best side, which is very charming, and his sensibilité charmed them. Of course he and the Empress drew charlatans, impudent tradesmen and women adventurers, male and female, and lunatics, as sugar draws flies. The begging letters, offers of service (mercantile), plans for making earth a heaven, solicitations to visit rare works of art (these were for the Czar) were endless. An inventor offered him for £80,000 a chemical secret that would enable him to destroy a whole army in a few minutes. But Cossack personal attendants, the faithful Danish dog and Russian greyhound, chamberlains and secretaries, formed an impenetrable barrier. Most Kings and Queens set great store on the sincere affection of their dogs. It is reposeful after the insincere cringing of courtiers, whom they must hold in suspicion. The Grand Duchess Olga has been guarded from her birth by a gigantic dog, as her grandmother, the Princess Alice was, in gilded cradle, by a Dandie Dinmont. The Imperial train provides a kennel for canine favourites, and a byre for three cows, which are carefully fed on green meat and exercised to keep them in health. The milk of the Grand Duchess's cow was at each milking microscopically tested. The doctor thought unboiled milk best for a baby.

Like his nose, the Czar's talk is piquant. But he does not seek to shine in conversation, and mistrusts literary effect in speeches. Do you not think that epithets and superlatives rob a ruler's public utterances of dignity? "I am that I am" is the essence of Czarism. This, at any rate, invests it with a kind of grandeur.

The uniform of Hetman of the Cossacks is a dressing-gown of soft cloth open at the sides of the skirt. It concealed, when the Czar was on horseback, the smallness of his figure. Carrying his head well, and broken from infancy to military discipline, he has a soldierly air in the saddle. We noticed what tiny feet he had, and somebody who often danced with the Dowager Czarina said they were a heritage from her.

Nicholas and Alexandra did not shine by the politeness of kings—punctuality. Fatigue was the excuse. They went at a pace of forty-eight hours in the twenty-four, and had to withstand sea-sickness, followed by intense excitement, racket, hourly anxiety for one another's lives, rushing from sight to sight, and holding all the time the candle to human vanity and folly. They had never had to face so many pairs of human eyes; and what sharp eyes, too! The idolatry of the crowds was far less great than expected, but still bewildering. What a sight it must have been to them to see a whole capital and a million of provincials there, ready to fling themselves at their heads, and cry, "Let us amalgamate our armies, nations, treasuries, and change the face of the world!"

But Nicholas II. has not a stomach for military adventure, and will prefer to play French potentiality as a diplomatic card. His high-strung nerves fit him for peaceful triumphs, and make the repose of home-life grateful. The Empress is not a vain, frivolous woman. She is a skilled accompanist, can play the hardest music at first sight, and could make a handsome livelihood as a pianist. Care was taken to provide her with a faultless grand piano—which she could have hardly used.

I do not see why the Empress—a thoroughly well-educated woman—should not wield an influence for good in all directions. The Russians are accustomed to exercise of power by Czarinas. Alexandra is said to wish with all her heart for peace to be preserved and for amity with her great relatives to be preserved. Her mother was a great sufferer from Prince Bismarck's war policy. At the close of the war of 1866 she called a daughter then born Irene, or Peace. She had a wretchedly anxious time when the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt was serving as a General in the invasion of France, and wore out her strength in ambulance nursing. The Czarina dates from 1872. I should not have known her from her photos. She must have sterling qualities which they do not even hint. The nose is like her mother's, and eyes and mouth like the Prince Consort's. The eyes betray standing anxieties, and the watchfulness of one who fears to blunder. They are fine eyes, of a blue that accords with a complexion fresh to the degree of ruddiness, and a matchless head of auburn (not red) hair. She was under all circumstances affable and lively. I could imagine her taking the helm when waves ran high, and steering safely. She rather, I was told, feared French criticism. It has been entirely in her favour. The Empress looked her best, either simply dressed or dans ses beaux atours, with Crown jewels and rich brocades, with her bust rising above an embankment of flowers. She was thus at the Opera House and Français. All girlish characteristics have disappeared, and she is now a fine woman, with features denoting character, and yet delicately chiselled.

Marie Antoinette, whose rooms at Versailles the Imperial couple visited, had for a playmate a schoolroom companion of a German princess, who became Margravine of Hesse-Darmstadt. They corresponded until the Royal Family of France were imprisoned in the Temple. The Margrave was jilted by the wife of Paul I., whose first wife was the Margrave's sister. Thus Hesse-Darmstadt became a hidden link between the Hermitage and Versailles. The Margravine was a clever and able woman, and got Bonaparte to raise her little state to a Grand Duchy, with a population of 1,200,000. Alexandra has thus family associations with Versailles. Could M. Hanotaux have read what I wrote about Louis XV.'s rooms? Dubarry and Pompadour were hidden away, and a peerless Nattie's portrait of Madame Louise of France was set on an easel. She died a Carmelite nun. The floral decorations of these rooms were delicious. Orchids, white lilacs, and French roses predominated.

I thought of watchdogs in seeing the forty officials in charge of the Imperial train. They were literally single-minded. Their one idea was noiselessly to obey orders. I thought them highly picturesque. The Cossack personal attendants were picturesque in another way. The head nurse might, in worse circumstances, have been a lady-help. The baby is a wide-awake, fresh-faced little thing, and like the Edinburghs when they were her age.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

RADICALISM tempered by Rosebery, dear Lady Betty, was neither fish nor flesh. That curious condition no longer exists. The Dalmeny Humpty Dumpty, who was unable to decide whether to be a Radical or a Tory, has "had a great fall," and all the race-horses and all the ring-men "couldn't put Humpty Dumpty in his place again."

On Friday night, at Edinburgh, Lord Rosebery pronounced a powerful funeral oration over his political remains. In the course of this speech he declared that a Liberal Peer-Premier was like a man who had to ride a horse without reins. He omitted to mention, however, that in his case the horse was being saddled for another, but that he had leapt upon its back. To return now and complain that it was difficult to ride is sublime assurance. It would have been astonishing had it been otherwise.

. . . . .

The following passage occurs in "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland:"—

"All right!" said the Cat; and this time it vanished quite slowly, beginning with the end of the tail and ending with the grin, which remained some time after the rest of it had gone.

"Well, I've often seen a cat without a grin," thought Alice; "but a grin without a cat! It's the most curious thing that I ever saw in all my life!"

Many of us have seen a Party without a Leader, but a Leader without a Party is indeed a most curious circumstance. That is precisely the condition which Lord Rosebery occupied.

At the meeting at Edinburgh the persuasive and plausible Primrose sprayed his audience over with Rosebery water. The speech was skilfully prepared, and the manner of its delivery was irreproachable. It must, however, be remembered that, if there is now an Armenian question, Lord Rosebery is responsible for its existence. It is Lord Rosebery who created it. Moreover, it is an open secret that, for the sake of continuity, Lord Salisbury adopted the foreign policy of his immediate predecessors, and it is the grave faults in that policy which have caused the numerous difficulties that have recently occurred.

Lord Rosebery has been seeking for a long time for an opportunity to resign with dignity a position which was untenable. The movement organised to force the Sultan to abandon the policy of massacre presented a magnificent opportunity, and Lord Rosebery seized it without delay. Every English man and woman is horrified by the atrocious conduct of the Royal Ripper, but every reasoning or reasonable person scouts the idea of hazarding a European war to deliver the Armenians.

The superstitious will be much alarmed when they hear of the two accidents which occurred in Downing-street on Saturday. That afternoon Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, who had just arrived in England from America, hurried to the Foreign Office to confer with Lord Salisbury, the latter having come from Hatfield for the interview. After the conference Mr. Chamberlain called a cab and by some combination of circumstances this ran against the stone balustrade in front of the Privy Council Office and the horse fell into the area.

Presently Lord Salisbury entered his brougham, and as it was driven out of Downing-street the horse knocked down a boy! It is believed that the conference was held to discuss Anglo-American affairs. The superstitious may be expected now to watch the Venezuelan controversy anxiously.

Twenty-six years ago the besieged Parisians were eating rats and dogs, were deposing their Emperor, and were devoting themselves to establishing a severe Republican system. Last week the guests of the President of the French Republic were eating "Blanquettes d'Ortolans de Landes," and "Faisans flanqués de Perdreaux sur Croustades," and the Parisians were welcoming the Emperor and Empress of Russia with frantic enthusiasm! The switchback of time develops many strange situations! The death of General Trochu, which occurred on the day the Emperor and Empress entered Paris, was an inopportune reminder of the misfortunes of 1870-1. From Trochu to Tsar what strange events have happened!

Some months ago it was announced in these columns that a syndicate had been formed to acquire Sheen House, near Richmond Park, with the object of forming it into a cycling club. Sheen House and its magnificent grounds have now been acquired upon a lease from Sir Harry Meux, and the club will soon be opened for the use of members. The cycle, like the carriage and the railway, has come to stay. It has frequently been pointed out in these columns that Londoners have within easy reach of every one of them a glorious park, to wit, Richmond Park, which except on Sundays few, if any, visit. The Sheen House Cycling Club is within fifty yards of the Sheen Gate of Richmond Park, and as West End members are joining the club eagerly it is probable that at last this large and magnificent park will become a fashionable resort. A large sum of money is to be spent in furnishing Sheen House, which is to contain several public and private dining-rooms. Every conceivable improvement is to be added to the grounds, and the syndicate is determined to provide the best cooking at reasonable prices. The formation of the Sheen House Cycling Club was much discussed during the season, and therefore the syndicate starts active operations with the best advice, with general support, and with success assured. On and after November 14 an entrance-fee will be imposed.

A correspondent has sent me the following :—

"Bamborough Castle in Northumberland is being restored by Lord Armstrong, who has bought the property, and by providing buildings elsewhere has managed to obtain control of the entire fabric, the charity schools having been removed to the buildings already mentioned. It is said to be his intention to provide a sort of home of rest in the restored castle for literary men. The work is a colossal one, an army of workmen being employed to complete it. The restoration comprises a vast kitchen and banqueting hall to communicate with the ancient keep, so well known as a landmark, or seamark. On the whole the restoration is being judiciously carried out, although it must be added that the remains of the original castle were so scanty—with the exception of the keep—that it was not possible to do much harm. This is probably by far the most important work of restoration ever attempted in this country, and the spectacle of modern workmen, affiliated to trades unions, fashioning mediæval arrow-slits and building battlements is especially curious. The amount of money expended upon the work must be very great, and although operations have been progressing over a year, comparatively little progress has been made. The example of Lord Armstrong suggests a glorious opening for millionaires who have difficulty in spending their money, for there are many castles in ruins in England where a thorough restoration might be effected. Whether Lord Armstrong will assign rooms in Bamborough Castle to the literary men according to their merits—some in the barbican, some in the keep, some in the dungeons, and others slid down oubliettes, remains to be seen."

Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

A MEETING of the Jockey Club is to be held at Newmarket this evening, when Lord Durham is to draw attention to the present unsatisfactory manner in which handicaps are made, and to move a resolution. The present system of handicapping is thoroughly chaotic, and during the last few months the sporting papers have been full of letters animadverting upon the flagrant inconsistencies of the officials, and the hugger-mugger fashion in which a great deal of their work is done. Lord Durham has already done good service as a Turf reformer, and, being a practical man, he is no doubt prepared with some reasonable plan for improving the present arrangements, as it would be of no use to inveigh against them unless he is prepared to suggest a remedy. The blunders in many recent handicaps have been so palpably egregious that one can only conclude that the weights are framed hurriedly and, as it were, with the left hand. It is eminently undesirable, for obvious reasons, that the whole of the great handicaps should be made by one man, the result being that the same mistakes are apparent in all of them. The handicapping of Bellevin at Manchester was perfectly ridiculous and could by no ingenuity be justified.

Although sixty-five two-year-olds were left in for the Imperial Produce Stakes at Kempton Park when the last forfeit was declared, and a subscription of £31 had to be paid on each entry, run or not, yet there were only nine starters on Friday, and the utterly uninteresting character of the race was proved by the fact that, while 7 to 4 was betted on Chelandry, the generous odds of 10 to 1 were offered, bar Lord Rosebery's filly, who, of course, won in a common canter. The running of Cyrenian was disappointing, as he had come to be generally regarded as a really smart colt. Sir Sydney (who has been sold by Mr. M. Dawson to Sir B. Maple) made an ignominious début, but he had been beaten in his trial, and was only started on the off chance. Why there was such strong fielding against Chelandry I cannot conceive, for there was nothing among the other starters to encourage the bookmakers in their hope of a turn-up. When the numbers were hoisted backers laid 5 to 2 on Chelandry, but before the flag fell 7 to 4 was being freely taken, and I believe that some people were able to get on at 6 to 4. Chelandry is engaged in the Middle Park Plate, but Velasquez is to represent Lord Rosebery in that race, and the filly will not be seen out again until the One Thousand Guineas, an event which at present looks like being a match between the Kempton winner and Goletta. Chelandry is in the Derby, the Oaks, the Coronation Stakes, the St. Leger, both the £10,000 stakes at Newmarket, and the Eclipse Stakes. If there was any betting on the Derby Lord Rosebery's pair would be first and second favourites. The filly has made a prodigious improvement during the last few months, but her owner ought to think himself vastly lucky in not having ruined her by the preposterous manner in which she was over-raced at Epsom on hard ground, and after her hard work at that meeting it was running a great risk to start her at Ascot.

There are 104 entries for the Middle Park Plate, but this also seems to be a "one-horse race." Orelio, the Duke of Westminster's dark brother to Ormonde, who is mentioned by some of the sporting papers as being likely to prove the most formidable opponent of Velasquez, will not run. He wants time, and it is doubtful whether he will be seen in public this season, but he may start for the Dewhurst Plate. The Duke's colt, Guernsey, and Lord Alington's fine colt Vesuvian, by Royal Hampton out of Fuse (who began the season with thirty-nine engagements), are also backward. Goletta had no chance with Velasquez at Goodwood, and here she will be meeting him on the same terms. Lord Rosebery's colt holds Berzak perfectly safe on the Doncaster running. Lowly will not run, and Wreath-Or, Sir Sydney, Santa Stella, Monterey, Smean, and Minstrel can have no chance. There was a great deal of talk in the summer about the high promise of Mr. James's 3,900 gs. filly Catherine Luther, but of late nothing has been heard of her; indeed, the high-priced yearlings of 1895 are not coming out well, in spite of the copious laudations of the people who make it their business to write up such stock. Nothing has yet been heard in favour of Mr. Bass's filly by St. Gatien out of Busybody, or of his 700 gs. colt by St. Serf out of Novitiate, dam of Marco. Sir J. Miller has three animals in the Middle Park Plate for which he paid upwards of £2,930 last year, and they have not yet distinguished themselves. Mr. J. A. Miller's 4,100 gs. filly by St. Simon out of Sterling Love has turned out a complete failure, nor have the animals for which Baron Hirsch paid such enormous prices done any good. It seems to me that Velasquez is quite sure to win the Middle Park Plate, and that Galtee More will probably finish second to Lord Rosebery's colt.

When writing last week about the Duke of York Handicap I predicted that either Rampion or Birch Rod would be the winner. The result was a veritable crash for the backers, as Chin Chin (25 to 1) won by a neck from Rampion (100 to 6), and the third was Amberite (33 to 1). Why such long odds were offered against the Duke of Westminster's colt it is impossible to understand. It was hard lines that Rampion should be just beaten by an animal to whom he was giving two years and 1 lb. The honours of the race certainly rested with the Kingsclere colt. There were eighteen starters, so the Duke of York Handicap has lost nothing in the way of popularity by having its value reduced to £2,000, for last year, when it was a stake of £5,000, there were only thirty-three acceptances (this year there were thirty-five), and then seventeen started. Quarrel was very heavily backed, and he was evidently the great public fancy; but as I stated last week, Lord Rosebery's horse must now be getting rather stale, as he has been in active work since February. Ghislaine has been amiss, and she might just as well have remained at home. The magnificent odds of 50 to 1 were everywhere offered against her. She will probably win a race at Derby or at Manchester.

The last week has been fertile in tragical surprises for Cesarewitch speculators. Portmarnock's collapse was a great blow to the public backers, for he had been the original favourite for this handicap, but every one at Newmarket knew that there was a weak place in the horse, and although he had been going so well on the soft ground, few people there were surprised when they heard that he had pulled up lame after his trial. Cypria was beaten in a trial, and so also was Fiesole, while Arlequin has gone so badly in the betting as to make his supporters quake.

For various reasons speculation on the Cesarewitch has been on a comparatively limited scale, but the Cambridgeshire will be a very heavy betting race, and already there are a dozen most "genuine" candidates. Sir Visto is still favourite, but I do not fancy Lord Rosebery's horse at the weights, and shall not be surprised if Avilion ultimately turns out to be his best candidate. Marco, who will meet Sir Visto at even weights, has been well backed, and for good money. The Manchester and Derby exhibitions of Marco were most unsatisfactory, and he will certainly require to have "come on" very considerably in order to win the Cambridgeshire with 8 st. 10 lb., unless there is an adequate excuse for his dismal show in the Manchester Cup, when he started second favourite (thanks to the money of the gullish herd), and finished in the ruck, never having at any time been prominent in the race. Thais has been very steady in the betting, but I do not for a moment believe that the Prince of Wales's filly can beat Canterbury Pilgrim at the weights, and it is doubtful whether Thais can stay the course with a strong run race. Winkfield's Pride, the Irish colt, is declared to be an absolute certainty, and with 6 st. 8 lb. to carry he is most leniently treated. La Sagesse was withdrawn from the Kempton Park race in order that she might be kept for the Cambridgeshire, but she does not seem to have much chance. Omnium II. will, no doubt, beat all the top-weights if he runs. Kilcock, who figures at 20 to 1, is overweighted. Chit Chat and Laodamia are certain to be backed for the Cambridgeshire if they fail to-day. My own opinion is that whatever beats Shaddock will win. Nothing has been heard about Champaubert since his hollow defeat in the Prix du Conseil Municipal, but it is simply idiotic to pay the slightest attention to the in-and-out running of the French horses. It is a queer thing that M. Abeille's steeds appear to dislike winning exceedingly whenever they are favourites. At Longchamps Champaubert was dead beat after they had gone a mile, and so decisive was his sudden collapse that Cannon at once ceased to persevere with him. That Omnium II. ought to have won the Ascot Cup (for which event I gave him a plumper) was obvious enough to all who saw that race run, and now it must be universally acknowledged that M. de St. Alary's horse was most unlucky in being beaten. I hope that Omnium II. will be entered for next year's Ascot Cup.

Dosser, a colt belonging to Captain Machell, who has been a great tip for all sorts of races, won the Walton Welter Plate at Kempton Park on Friday, and he has not thereby incurred a penalty for the Cambridgeshire, for which race his weight is 6 st. 8 lb., but as the running makes him out to be only about 4 lb. superior to Welbeck he cannot have much chance for that handicap.

Spook won the Richmond Plate at Kempton, this being his first success since he carried off the Union Jack Stakes at the Liverpool Spring Meeting. Spook, however, would not have been successful but for the very palpable refusal of Bradwardine to try when the pinch came. The colt was favourite, and he looked like winning easily, but directly he heard the whips cracking he stopped hopelessly.

There are four foals by Ormonde now in the United States. He is also represented by one two-year-old (Orestes) and by one yearling, a filly named Rosamond, who is owned by Mr. Stamford.

It has been decided to start Persimmon to-morrow for the Lowther Stakes, and he ought to win that race, but it would have been a wiser policy to have "thrown up" this horse for the season after all the work he has done, and having regard to his very valuable engagements next year. I dare say Persimmon will be kept in work until the Houghton week, in order that he may run for the Free Handicap. If Shaddock starts to-morrow he will very likely beat Persimmon, who has to give him 4 lb.

Next week there will be racing at Newcastle (Gosforth Park), Gatwick, and Sandown Park. The fields at the Newcastle Autumn Meeting are almost exclusively supplied by the Yorkshire stables, and the most interesting sport will be at the two Southern fixtures. There are twenty-five acceptances for the Gatwick Handicap of £1,000, which is run on Wednesday, and Safety Pin and Prince Barcaldine are both very well in. The Sandown Foal Stakes of £2,000 would have been a certainty for either Galeazzo or St. Frusquin if those horses had kept on their legs. Thirty-three animals accepted for this race, and Lord Rosebery seems to have an excellent chance of winning with Avilion, who can surely beat Yorker, Conroy, Serfdom, and Lord Hervey, the only other animals in the list which have shown respectable form. It is unlucky for the Duke of Portland that he should have paid forfeit with His Reverence in January last. Avilion will not incur a penalty for the Cambridgeshire by winning this race. There is a huge entry for the Great Sapling Plate of £1,000, and Mr. A. James may win with Catherine Luther, the 3,900 gs. filly by St. Simon out of Heresy, as she ought to be able to beat Berzak and Eager at the weight if she has any pretensions to be really smart. There is also a large entry for the Hersham Plate of £500, including Berzak, who will win if he starts. If the American colt does not run, then Lord Derby may win with Crestfallen. There are twenty-seven acceptances for the Orleans Nursery of £500, and Wreath Or and Mohur are both most leniently treated. However, handicaps of all descriptions are very dangerous to meddle with at this period of the season, when many horses which have been cleverly "steadied" begin to discover an excellence of form which nobody who has watched their earlier running would have been disposed to credit them with.

PARSONS AND PROFESSIONALISM.

It would be impertinent and irrelevant in this column to touch either on politics or theology. But when priests and politicians intrude upon the sphere of sport then it is necessary to retaliate. Of course one knows that Mr. Rowland Hill, of the Rugby Football Union, is possessed of an undying hatred of the modern tendency to professionalism in sport, especially in football. One can respect, if one cannot altogether agree, with a man who expresses honest convictions in such a straightforward manner as he does. But why should a Church Congress afford a platform for such a theme? It was a trite saying of Thomasius, who warned the unlearned about putting their sickles into the field of dread theology. Why should the Church, then, put her sickle into the field of sport, unless it be to cut away the rotten growth and give the good seed room wherein to flourish? This should have been the reason that actuated the Congress in getting the services of Mr. Rowland Hill as a lecturer. Perhaps the organisers of the meeting thought that sport must be touched on because it is fashionable and attracts a lot of attention, and the Church must show broad-mindedness and review every aspect of our national life.

Whatever may have been the cause, there was the effect in the cheers of the Congress as Mr. Rowland Hill cursed the professional football-player, but then he had scarcely such an assent to his wild crusade when he inveighed against the testimonial to Dr. Grace and the gate-money-making cricket tour of the Australians. Logic and consistency, he said, necessitated this further condemnation; but what do logic and consistency say to a presentation watch and chain for services rendered to sport, and to the tour of Rugby football players in South Africa, where the gate pays expenses? But I return to the professional football player. Poor fellow! he surely has enough kicks and bruises in his own game without being touched up by the ecclesiastical boot as well. He does not deserve to be cursed as he is cursed, and the fact that the members of the Congress cheered his assailant shows how utterly they fail to appreciate the good work that professionalism in football has done. The speaker instanced the Liverpool and Everton match, at which 40,000 people were present watching twenty-two paid players playing first-class football for all they were worth. That is to say, 40,000 people had open-air enjoyment for a whole Saturday afternoon at an entertainment that afforded a common ground for conversation and social intercourse. Where would those spectators have been with the time hanging heavily on their hands if they had not been there? The parsons always answer such a conundrum in a sermon by saying "In the pubs.," but not so bluntly. There were probably more men at that match than there were in all the churches in Liverpool the following Sunday. And yet the Church existed before the Football League. Of course, there are abuses in professional football, and so there are in the Church. But, to carry the war into the enemy's camp, in a football team one man is not paid a large income to do nothing whilst another is called on to bear the burden and heat of the fray at a starvation wage. Well-paid positions in a football team with no work cannot be had by any duffer who has money enough to buy them. A captain cannot jockey a friend into a good place. One man is not paid by several teams at the same time. There are no rich livings with nothing to do; there are no presentations and advowsons to be purchased; there are no pluralities; there are no tithes to be paid whether the payer is a churchman or not; and men get their positions on their merits. The increase of the popularity of football in the North and Midlands necessitated professional play. It was impossible to expect amateurism to flourish in the manufacturing centres. There was not enough material. These paid players give a large number of people healthy recreation, amusement, and excitement. It would be impossible to find vacant spaces sufficient for all these spectators to play football themselves. Nearly all of them, from one cause or another, could not play even as amateurs. Where there is good football there are sure to be a large number of minor organisations, which have sprung up as rapidly as mushrooms all over the kingdom in the last few years. The present popularity and interest in the Association game is almost wholly due to paid players. They have done a lot of good work and are entitled to be defended against such attacks as they were subjected to at an important gathering like the Church Congress. One must admit that the populace are in some cases too devoted to the game. Masters complain of men leaving their work to see matches played, and parsons complain when work is over that their churches are empty. But whose fault is that? It is pure stuff and nonsense to talk about sport for sport's sake, and ignore the money side of the affair. One might as well prate about religion for religion's sake and shut one's ear to the parson's appeal for funds. The monetary question is bound to make itself felt in one way or another. Blackheath is a prosperous football club because it has a good management, a good ground, and, above all, good "gates." In any amateur sport the money acquired is devoted to some club object. The cash benefits the sportsmen indirectly if not directly. The comfort of the members of the M.C.C. is enhanced by the gates at the cricket matches. The spectators at Queen's help to pay the shareholders a dividend. But the person who gets interest on his capital in this way is not a "pro," and yet he may live entirely on the profit drawn from sport. Why, then, should the professional, who is paid directly, be condemned? Abuses, as I have said, do exist, and it is very necessary to ensure that the interests of those who do not desire to be paid for playing football or cricket or taking part in any other sport should be protected. But if it is to be laid down that sport is only properly and honourably indulged in when the sportsman pays every expense, and gets no benefit, direct or indirect, from it, then sport becomes the privilege of millionaires, and the masses must be left out in the cold.

There are some fifty-three teams entered for Army Association football cups, and matches have been arranged between the Army and the Corinthians, London, Surrey, and Middlesex. It is to be hoped that Mr. Lowther, the energetic Hon. Sec. of the Army Football Association, will receive better support than he did last year in these Army matches. It is most unsportsmanlike not to support him with a representative team on the few occasions he mentions when he has to organise all the Cup ties.

A correspondent from Middlesex Hospital calls attention to the fact that their Rugby team was beaten by Lennox by thirty-seven points to nil, and he says that while the Rugby team is nearly defunct the Association is practically moribund. There is ample material for a really good Rugby team, and it is perfectly scandalous that a hospital which until recently did so well in the Cup ties should have come to such a pass as this. The present want of enthusiasm and esprit de corps reflects alike on the students and the authorities of the medical school as well.

Needless to say the swimming entertainment given by the Otters was a great success. The excitement over the team match between the club and the rest of London was intense. Cohen and Allason swam grandly at a critical moment, and the club well deserved its victory. It is all very well for some people to say that they could get another team to represent London that would beat the one chosen. It is extremely doubtful if this could be done, and if one or two who were originally invited did not see fit to accept they have only themselves to blame. The others may well be proud of the strength of their club. Their ornamental swimming was very clever, and Allason followed up Green's successes by winning the plunging championship, and cutting all records at the Lewisham baths. There is now a time limit of one minute for the plunge. The consequence is the take off from the board and the method of entering the water is much more carefully studied. The winner did over 73 ft. in the minute. The Cygnus Club had a very pleasant meeting, and both the club and open handicaps produced good finishes, Welch and Gammon being the winners.

Sheen House is to be converted into a cycle club. There will be a cement track and professional riders will race for the benefit of the members. If I am not very much mistaken the club and track will supply a want which is making itself felt. Cycling is now so popular that there are a class of gentlemen riders who would very much like to race. For reasons that need not be discussed they do not care about going about to bicycle meetings and being harassed by the vexatious regulations of the National Cyclists Union officials. At a club like the one that has been referred to it will be possible on a suitable track to organise regular race meetings irrespective of the N.C.U. If these races are started and properly managed, bicycle-racing will not long be confined to the class of racers to which it is at present. And so much the better for the trade. A correspondent says that in St. Petersburg there are few lady riders and every one has to pass a pretty severe test before getting a licence and a number. In Stockholm all riders wear huge numbers which are registered on the back of the saddle. He considers this is degrading and thinks it lowers a private rider to the level of a hackney cab. But the method is not without merits.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—Although a temporary improvement occurred at one time in the stock markets during the past week, it has not been maintained, several fresh unsatisfactory developments playing into the hands of the "Bears." It is true that the Czar's visit to Paris has come to an end without any hitch, and without any political incident which could give offence to the other Powers. It appears also that an understanding has practically been arrived at between this country, Russia, and France regarding the measures to be taken concerning Turkey, and all fears of the Eastern Question leading to an European war may now be dismissed as groundless. But there has unfortunately again been which has for the time caused a fresh set-back in most of the departments. The Kaffir Circus is but slowly emerging from another scare, due chiefly to the discomfiture of a large French operator, whose account precisely in the dangerous gambling counters against which I have so often warned my readers, viz., Rand Mines, Limited, East Rands, and Consolidated Goldfields, has had to be closed. His stock has now all been taken over, and the position has also improved by an agreement come to amongst the leading South African millionaires to support their stocks simultaneously, and to prevent any further decline, thus counteracting the "Bear" tactics, which have depressed this market so much of late. Apprehensions are being entertained of a further rise in the value of money, owing to the renewal of gold shipments to the United States, something like a million sterling having already been despatched from London and Paris. It is not improbable that further amounts will follow, although it is not expected that the movement will assume very large proportions. The efflux of gold, while strengthening the position in the United States, is opposed to the recovery which had commenced in gilt-edged securities, and these are, as I have frequently remarked, still too high. In view of the splendid traffic returns, however, there seems to be absolutely no reason why moderately high rates for money should affect Home Rails; and there has been so much speculative selling of late, that the market position is distinctly better. In the Foreign Department the weakness of Spanish has been a feature; but this is, except in its bearing upon the Paris Bourse, of very little moment to English investors and operators, who have long ago parted company with Spanish. The crisis in Brazil, and the heavy fall in the bonds, is another incident which is not calculated to help South Americans generally; but it should not affect the rest of the markets. American Rails have at times been firm, and although a reaction has taken place, there is still every indication that McKinley will win the Presidential election. The last New York bank statement, moreover, proved much more favourable than had been anticipated, and with the assistance of the gold shipments which have just taken place it is quite likely that American Rails will brace up again. Considerable strength has during the past few days been shown by the West Australian department, in which three of the strongest groups have come to an arrangement under which they will defend their stocks against the attacks of the "Bear" party, who have been so busy of late. Another rush of Cycle Companies appears to be at hand, and against some of these investors will have to be very much on their guard. This, however, does not apply to the Clément, Gladiator, and Humber (France), Limited, which looks very promising, and is being piloted by the strong people who made the issue of the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company so great a success.

Home Rails.

Moderate fluctuations have been marked in Home Rails. At the commencement of the week the publication of excellent traffics put prices up, while subsequently the renewed money scare caused a relapse. I can quite understand that the prior-charges, which had been rigged to so high a point, should give way on the resumption of gold shipments to the United States; but as the latter are not expected to assume large proportions, and as anything like a 3 or even 4 per cent. bank rate is not likely to hurt stocks yielding up to 4 per cent., and promising even a higher return in view of continued traffic increases, I look upon the fresh reaction as quite uncalled for, especially as there is very little floating stock about and investment purchases continue on the part of small capitalists. The settled weather at once stimulated traffics last week, and what could be more favourable than an increase of £61,000 for the week ending October 4 on the leading lines, in view of the fact that this comes on the top of good returns in 1895? Some of the most satisfactory increases were those of £3,513 of the South-Eastern, £5,446 of the North British, and £4,259 of the Caledonian; but some of the Heavies also show well, notably the North-Western. For the week ending October 11 another splendid traffic increase of £2,300 is shown by the South-Eastern. Present quotations of Dover "A," Caledonian Deferred (Coras), and North British Deferred are much too low, and should promptly give way to a recovery, especially as the "Bull" account has been greatly reduced. Efforts are being made to create public interest in Great Eastern by bucket-shop tips, but I consider Dover "A" far preferable to Great Eastern. Brighton "A" also look promising, as the coming season is expected to prove a good one, especially if more settled atmospheric conditions should be maintained. The Heavies have moved within narrow limits, and while the yields are not calculated to justify an advance, I hardly see any reason for any important fall from the present prices.

The District Manifesto.

The issue of a circular by the Metropolitan District Railway Shareholders' Association, giving full particulars of the scheme for a deep-level express service from Earl's-court to the Mansion House, will have demonstrated to the shareholders, and to the speculators in this stock, that this is a serious movement which will be carried out with energy, skill, and forethought. The circular states, first, that the scheme which has been unanimously approved by the Directors of the Metropolitan District Railway Company is for the construction of two deep-level tunnels for an up-and-down service of express electric trains between Earl's-court and the Mansion House, with an intermediate station at Charing Cross. Secondly, Sir Benjamin Baker, the engineer of the Company, foreseeing no unusual difficulties, and acting upon the joint instructions of the Company and the Association, is now preparing a survey and report on the lines in projection. Thirdly, the survey and report are expected to be completed and a Bill prepared for Parliament by November 15 next. The Association shows its thorough belief in the undertaking by advancing £1,000,000 sterling at 4 per cent. interest, non-accumulative, for the purposes of carrying out the scheme, and for the better equipment of the existing service; while foregoing interest on the advance until the existing £1,500,000 Preference stock is in receipt of its full 5 per cent. dividend. The Association also provides all the preliminary expenses and the statutory deposit to Parliament, against all of which services it stipulates for a deferred bonus of one-half the profits after the existing Ordinary stock has received a dividend of 5 per cent. The fact that the Association gives such excellent terms to the District Company should teach District shareholders that there is now a great future open for their stock. There can be, in fact, no doubt that the separation of the through traffic of the line from the ordinary accommodation trains will greatly increase its carrying capacity. It is not surprising that Mr. J. S. Forbes should have received the proposal warmly, as he has always looked to the Western extensions for the future of the Company, and the possibilities of an express service in connection with the North-Western and Great Western are obviously great. Cheap mid-day fares will also attract additional traffic for the ordinary service. I am glad to see that it is also proposed to improve the accommodation, both as regards waiting-rooms and lavatories, at Earl's Court and the Mansion House, and that similar improvements, including refreshment-rooms, are to be carried out at Charing Cross; in fact, it is gratifying to see a very progressive spirit prevailing, which should work great benefits for the Company. According to the Financial News, the promoters point out that, "the existing capital being under £8,000,000 (actually £7,836,569), the new £1,000,000 would increase it by less than 12½ per cent., while the earning power of the Company might be increased by some £6,000 a week gross, or, say, by 75 per cent." Without entering into traffic estimates the details of which are not available, it is pointed out that if the net earnings of the District Railway could be increased by 75 per cent. sufficient would remain, after paying the full 5 per cent. on the Preference stock, and 4 per cent. on £1,000,000 of new capital, to pay close on 4 per cent. on the Ordinary stock. The "Market" seems to have been slow in realising the importance of this new departure. There used to be a principle upon which operators acted, viz., to buy Districts at about 25 and sell them again at over 30. But this is not applicable to the present case, when the important extensions, above referred to, are considered. What will probably appeal to the market more strongly will be the discovery, which they are about to make, that over £1,000,000 sterling of stock—out of a total of £2,250,000—has passed into the hands of one strong group, and that stock has been mopped up to such an extent that there is nothing left for them to play with. Under the circumstances, the present price should constitute merely the commencement of an advance, which may eventually put the quotation up to par.

Yankee Rails Fluctuating.

A great deal of strength has been displayed by Yankee Rails at times, and, although reactions occur every now and then, this market always braces up again. What troubles the other departments, viz., the resumption of gold shipments to the United States on a large scale is obviously a "Bull" point for the Yankee market. Another satisfactory development is the favourable nature of the last statement of the New York Associated Banks, which took the New York "Bears" by surprise. As one of my American contemporaries puts it, easy money, important gold imports, heavy grain and merchandise exports, and a sound money victory in November, are four "Bull" cards that can beat anything played against them. Including shipments from France, about one million sterling in gold has now again been despatched to the States from this side; and it would not be surprising if some more Australian sovereigns were to go direct from the colonies following the arrival at San Francisco from Australia of £500,000, which has been deposited in the Mint there. The situation is no way altered as regards the outlook for the Presidential elections, and New York is fully convinced that Mr. McKinley will be elected with a large majority. According to mail advices, Chairman Edward Lauterbach, of the Republican County Committee, who is perhaps in as good position as any one, and in fact better than many in New York, to accurately gauge political sentiment, in a public speech, claimed that the State and National tickets will win in New York by from 400,000 to 500,000 majority, and that the Republicans will elect nearly all the Assemblymen, and elect Thomas C. Platt to the United States Senate. It is also stated that Mr. Isidore Wormser at the Windsor Hotel, has offered to wager 5,000 dols. that Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan would give a majority for McKinley—all States together or separately, just as wanted. He was also willing to bet that New York city would give McKinley a handsome majority. Bets do not, of course, prove anything, but the statements mentioned show how strong the view is now in favour of a Republican victory. Of course, moderate reactions and setbacks must be expected, and are absolutely necessary for a healthy speculative situation; but as imports of gold, and exports of grain, cotton, breadstuffs, and merchandise continue, and mills and factories are resuming operations, it is evident that the commercial position is also improving. One of the most encouraging features is certainly the resumption of work by a number of industrial undertakings, from sewing-machine Companies to coke Companies, blast furnaces, hauling mills, &c. Milwaukee have not been strong of late, there having evidently been large realisations of profits, which leave the market somewhat weaker; but Louisville are remarkably strong, and maintain their price in the midst of weak surroundings. This is not surprising as the annual statement shows a large surplus, and a very sound position, altogether disproving the false reports which were disseminated by unscrupulous "Bears," of whom there are still many in this stock. I maintain the view that the junior securities in the reconstructed Companies, on which large assessments have been paid, may safely be bought, and that Erie Prefs. and Ordinary, and Southern Prefs. and Ordinary are, under the circumstances, a good purchase. A leading New York firm, in advising its friends to buy the low-priced stocks, expresses the opinion that whoever locks up an assortment of stocks selling below, say 15 dols., with no assessment pending, will one day within the next year or two have a profit of from 100 to 200 per cent. on his investment; and the firm adds to these Union Pacifics, as an assessment will not be finally levied by the Reorganisation Committee until an arrangement has been come to with regard to the Government debt. Canadian Pacifics are easier, and Grand Trunks are barely steady, the annual report not having been calculated to stimulate purchases. Another traffic increase for the first week of October is, however, promising.

Foreigners and South Americans.

The foreign market has been under the influence of a fresh collapse in Spanish, which are fluctuating with the varying chances of a new loan. Negotiations are known to be going on for such an issue, but a temporary relapse to 59⅝ on Saturday, from which there has been a recovery to 60, shows that prospects are still much involved. Investors in this country need not trouble themselves much about Spanish, to which they have given the go-by long ago; at all events, if they have followed my advice. Turks are slightly easier, Russians are firm, and Italians have been adversely affected by the collapse in Spanish. All these movements are of little direct interest on this side, but their influence upon the Paris Bourse must necessarily affect the London Stock Exchange indirectly. An unfavourable development, which has knocked down South Americans, has been the news of the outbreak of a financial crisis in Rio Janeiro. Brazilians have of course suffered most, a decline of from three or five points having been established in the various issues. I have not held a favourable view of Brazilian finance for some time, and for that reason have not seen my way to advise investment in the bonds. Argentine Government stocks have dropped a couple of points in sympathy. The matter of the unification of the debt has made no progress so far, but it is now reported that Dr. Pelligrini is proceeding to London on a financial mission, which probably refers to the unification scheme. Uruguay bonds are lower in sympathy with the general South American setback, from which Mexican Sixes have at last also suffered; but these are probably only temporary reactions, which should present an opportunity to investors to buy cheaply.

The Kaffir Circus.

A certain philosopher said that the greatest object in the universe is "the spectacle of a good man struggling with adversity," to which Goldsmith adds that "there is a still greater, which is the good man that comes to relieve it." These pronouncements seem at present to apply more especially to the Kaffir Circus. Far be it from me to say that the operators in the Kaffir Circus are all good men, and still less to apply the term to all the South African millionaires; but there is no doubt that operators and investors in South African Mines have been manfully struggling against adversity, and I have now good grounds for saying that some of the leading millionaires connected with the Kaffir Circus are doing their best to relieve the trouble, not perhaps from philanthropic motives, but from an instinct of self-preservation. I stated last week that the real source of weakness in South African Mining and Land shares was the precarious position in Paris. A great many forced sales had already taken place, and finally a big plunger was in distress which called for special measures. His stock has been taken over, and an understanding has, I am told, been arrived at between the large financial houses connected with South Africa to simultaneously support their groups, not for the purpose of rigging the market, but in order to protect it against the inroads of the ursine party. The rumour of labour troubles in Johannesburg temporarily neutralised these efforts, but the reports have proved altogether exaggerated; and in view of the prevalence of the rinderpest, and the scarcity of mealies, the natives will not be able to give much trouble, especially as a fresh supply has been arranged for from the Portuguese territory. The September crushings were not as satisfactory as they might have been, amounting as they did to 202,561 oz., and showing, therefore, a decrease of 9,868 oz. on the previous month's return. It must, however, be considered that September was a shorter month, so that the difference is but small. The weakness chiefly centred in Chartered, Rand Mines, Limited, Consolidated Goldfields, and East Rands. The defaulting Paris speculator had apparently loaded up with the three last-named, and with De Beers. All manner of rumours were circulated with reference to the Consolidated Goldfields, amongst which was the report that the dividend would be passed. On this point, however, nothing is really known, the Directors not having met yet to consider their action. I cannot, however, see why the collapse in these speculative securities should affect sound Transvaal shares, declines in which are altogether unreasonable and uncalled for, and I strongly advise my readers to stick tight to their holdings, as the prosperity of the mining industry in the Transvaal justifies in every way a higher range of values than that now prevailing. Randfontein, more especially, should stand at a much higher figure; and so should the various Barnato stocks, which, however, are now showing a firmer front, as I understand that Mr. B. I. Barnato (in common with other South African magnates) is now determined to give the necessary support. With reference to the Royal Sheba, the African Critic, in quoting my remarks, suggests that now I have seconded the writer's demand for an explanation, the Directors will more readily accede to it; but so far no explanation of the alleged false return has been forthcoming. The African Critic furnishes some particulars of the Klerksdorp Reefs promotion, which it attributes to Mr. Mackusick, of the Universal Stock Exchange. The Klerksdorp correspondent of my contemporary states that as the Company's agent there has received no money on his demand for funds, the claims have lapsed back to the Government, and will be sold by public auction there within a month's time. This is also a matter upon which the fullest explanations ought to be demanded by the shareholders. A favourable development is the news that at the Glen Deep the deep level of the May Consolidated and the Glencairn main series has been cut in No. 1 shaft at about 920 ft. depth; but it was found to be split into two portions which are expected to unite. Advices from the Meyer and Charlton appear to be satisfactory, as the main-reef leader has been opened up in two levels, and samples taken over a width of 3 ft. in a winze sunk from the 5-ft. level were found to assay from 2 oz. to 3 oz. per ton. The shutting-down of the Stanhope battery has not come as a surprise upon me, and I have, in fact, always had a poor opinion of this property. It is quite time that Knights should recover again. The recent relapse was altogether unjustified, and should give place to a considerable improvement. These shares have only been knocked down in sympathy with others of the same group. On Wednesday next the first annual meeting of the Adler's Consolidated Mining and Land Corporation, Limited, will be held, and the Directors' report, which has just been published, shows very good results. The balance to the credit of profit and loss, after paying all expenses, amounts to £30,479, out of which the Directors propose the payment of a dividend of 10 per cent. on the 213,000 shares issued, which would absorb £21,300, carrying the balance forward. It is satisfactory to notice that this profit has been earned without selling any of the properties of the Corporation originally acquired, and that the cash in hand at the end of the financial year (September 30) was no less a sum than £41,525. Beyond the profit carried to Profit and Loss there is a sum of £50,600 obtained as premium on shares issued, which is not divisible as dividend, but will form the nucleus of a reserve fund. Another pleasing point is the fact that this Corporation has been very prudently managed, and has to a considerable extent kept its assets liquid. The Transvaal Coal Trust pays no dividend for the past six months, at which readers of TRUTH will not be surprised. As regards the amalgamation of the Klerksdorp Gold and the Southern Klerksdorp Companies, it appears to me that it is only done for the purpose of obtaining the £40,000 which the latter Company has, while the Klerksdorp Gold Company is badly in want of funds. The news from the Barberton Estates and Gold Mining Company is very unsatisfactory, and altogether in contradiction to the sanguine predictions which were made by its promoters. The only redeeming point about this matter is that the shares are still chiefly in the hands of the vendors. The Bradbury Drill Sharpener meeting disclosed a very unsatisfactory state of things; but the Directors carried the day, although I am glad to see that they have been prevailed upon to make room for two new Directors, Messrs. Patterson and Marshall having resigned in favour of Messrs. Horsfall and Ranson, who were members of the Investigation Committee. This is the case of a very promising Industrial Company badly managed, and I hope that in future it will be carried out on a more satisfactory basis. I am glad to see that the works of the construction of the Pretoria-Pietersburg Railway have commenced, and also that the Government Railway Commissioner has approved of the specifications of the rails and rolling stock. It is important news for all those interested in the development of the country between Pretoria and Pietersburg, and in the Transvaal generally, as it is evident that the Government are trying to facilitate transport so as to counteract the rinderpest difficulty. It should be distinctly understood that this has nothing to do with the Silati Railway. Diamond shares have at one time been exceedingly weak, partly in connection with the forced realisations already referred to; and De Beers are much lower at 27⅛, New Jagersfontein at 8⅝ xd.

Mr. Barnato on the Position.

I have so frequently urged Mr. B. I. Barnato to give the shareholders in his group the benefit of the considerable amount of information which he has been able to collect during his recent visit to the Transvaal, that I notice with satisfaction that he has at last unbosomed himself in the columns of a new contemporary, the South African Star. It seems to me, however, that the statement which he has made has not received that publicity and attention on the part of investors to which it is undoubtedly entitled. I will therefore briefly recapitulate the various important points which he brought out when interviewed on that occasion. Mr. Barnato starts with a reference to the meeting authorising the amalgamation of the Barnato Bank and other undertakings with the Johannesburg Investment Company, which was unanimous; and he replies to the criticism as regards the amalgamation, that, owing to the tremendous expansion of business in the Transvaal, the Consolidated Investment Company was too small to do all the good business offered. Then the Barnato Bank came into existence, and he found subsequently that the two businesses clashed. Mr. Barnato's belief in the success of the amalgamated undertaking is boundless, and he calls it the biggest financial company in the world, and predicts that it will be one of the greatest successes. He relies for this success on financial business and on the administration of large landed estates. With reference to the financial business, he brings out the fact that advances on mining securities have been and will be made by the Company in Johannesburg at rates varying from 9 to 14 per cent., and that they have never made any bad debts. The Company will also be the agents for forty companies and landed properties, buying all their goods and charging them commission. But to the landed estate owned by the Company Mr. Barnato attaches most importance, as Johannesburg must expand. When last in South Africa he came to the conclusion that there never would be a resident population south of the reef, and that was the reason of his acquiring the Yeovil, Berea, and Doornfontein Estates, and a controlling interest in the Houghton Estate, also big tracts of ground between Orange Grove and Johannesburg. He estimates 12,000 plots of building land owned by the Company as being worth £72,000 a year for groundrents, to say nothing of sales, and he further reckons the market value at from £150 to £750 per stand. He also directs attention to the three big blocks of the Company in the centre of Johannesburg, and to other property at Johannesburg and Delagoa Bay. Referring to the mining properties, Mr. Barnato draws attention to the fact that they include mines in nearly every part of the country, a twentieth interest in the Jagersfontein mine, costing only £50,000, and the Leeuwpoort property, which cost £100,000, and brings in claim licences alone, some £10,000 a year. The 930 claims next to the Central Nigel will, according to the engineer's estimate, ultimately yield a profit of £1,350,000. I cannot possibly enumerate all Mr. Barnato's remarks on the various properties, but I may state with reference to the Glencairn and Glenluce that Mr. Barnato considers it a maiden property, that he obtained it with great difficulty, and that the directors took it upon themselves to carry the matter out without calling a meeting, as the delay would have meant a stoppage of development work for at least two months. I am glad to see, however, that Mr. Barnato, after recent experiences proposes, to call meetings before deciding upon any operations in future; and I think he will do well in thus taking the shareholders into his confidence. With reference to the Transvaal Government's action in guaranteeing the Wonderfontein scheme at £20,000 a year, Mr. Barnato thinks there is not the slightest occasion for the shareholders in the Johannesburg Waterworks Company to be alarmed, as to get water from the Wonderfontein they will have to pump it 1,100 ft. for fifty miles, and he calculates that the work of construction will take four years, and by that time Mr. Barnato is of opinion that their own freehold estates will be carrying a big residental population. With regard to the market outlook, Mr. Barnato emphazises the point that 1896 has been a very unlucky year of severe shocks. Since he has returned to England he has put a very large sum of money, something over a million, into the market, but he further brings out the fact that the bottom of the country has not fallen out, that the industry is still there, and that nothing short of a volcanic eruption will prevent its expansion. He also states that his firm owns one-half of the capital of the new Consolidated Company, that he is not selling a share, and that he has shown his own belief in the undertaking by giving the Company the option of selling to him 200,000 shares for £750,000, while professing himself prepared to give the shareholders a clear profit of one million sterling on the bargains he made for them when he was in Johannesburg. The very fact that Messrs. Barnato have guaranteed the new issue of Johnnies at $3\frac{3}{4}$ should show the shareholders that these shares are absolutely certain to return to that price at least, and they should under no circumstances throw them away at the present absurdly low quotation. What applies to Johnnies and Barnato Banks applies equally to the whole of the shares of the Barnato group. Under the guidance and with the support of the Johannesburg Investment Company, they will doubtless achieve renewed success in the next few years. Perhaps the temporary absence of Mr. Sol Joel and of Mr. J. Hays Hammond during the political troubles and their imprisonment may have somewhat interfered with the conduct of mining operations; but the present consulting engineer of the group, Mr. Starr, is a most reliable and experienced man, who will doubtless carry the various enterprises to a successful issue. Mr. Sol Joel, moreover, is returning at the end of this month to Johannesburg, there to represent the firm and to attend to the vast interests of the group; and I think that there are fair grounds for shareholders in the Barnato stocks to look hopefully into the future, notwithstanding the many ill-natured and no doubt partly-interested attacks which have of late been levelled against them.

Golden West Australia.

I am glad to be able to say that what has happened in the South African market is also coming about in the West Australian department—viz., that several of the large groups have realised the desirability of concerted action. I may say that I have myself been instrumental in influencing the decision in certain quarters. As a result I think that, barring accidents, the "Bears" will in future find that it will be extremely difficult to put down quotations of substantial properties owned by strong groups. Assisted as they were by so many surrounding circumstances, they have done their worst to wreck the West Australian market, but fortunately they have not succeeded, and this department is now strong enough to even display firmness when South Africans are under the influence of a pronounced slump. What I have said points, however, specially the lesson which I have repeatedly urged, that it is important to invest in West Australian Mining shares belonging to strong groups, which will take care that not only are the properties well developed and equipped with ample machinery, but also that the market will not suffer a sudden collapse through "Bear" attacks. Promoters will contribute much towards the future strength of this market if they will refrain from trying to float undeveloped properties; in fact, they ought to act on my advice and stop the issue of new Companies altogether. The news from Western Australia continues very satisfactory, both as regards new discoveries and crushings by older-established properties. During the worst depression in the South African market Lake View Consols were at one time knocked down to $7\frac{1}{4}$, but they have since rallied to $7\frac{3}{4}$; and this is certainly one of the properties in connection with which the "Bears" will never be able to score. By the way, Mr. Charles Kaufman will be amongst us in a few weeks, and he is so ardent an admirer of his pet, Lake View Consols, that we shall hear a great deal about this premier mine of Western Australia on his arrival. My prediction with reference to London and Globe Finance and West Australian Exploring and Finance is becoming true, these shares having advanced to $4\frac{5}{8}$-$\frac{3}{4}$. Had the surroundings been more encouraging these shares would already have stood much higher; but there is no doubt that eventually, and as we are nearing the announcement of the splendid results achieved by them, we shall see quite a jump in these quotations. Hannan's Golden Treasure and Golden Group have been steady, but they ought to stand higher than they do at present. The "Bears" have been unable to make any further impression upon Hampton Plains, which remain at $3\frac{15}{16}$ with 4s. per share to come off, and will, as soon as a general rally comes about, bound upwards. I see that Mr. Allen H. P. Stoneham has addressed a circular letter to the shareholders of the West Australian Goldfields, Limited, the Hampton Plains Estate, Limited, and the West Australian Share Corporation, Limited, in which he argues (in reply to many inquiries from shareholders) that there is absolutely no reason in the present depression of these shares. He enters fully into the various points, and comes to the conclusion that very few actual sales have taken place according to the Share Register, so that the marking-down of prices must be due to the action of those who wish to buy cheaper. His final remark, that "there never was a better time than the present for the purchase of shares in Companies which have overcome the initial difficulties, and are now on the eve of certain success," I fully endorse. In the shares of the West Australian (Gold District) Trading Association quite a lively struggle has been proceeding. At one time the ordinary shares were depressed to $\frac{5}{8}$, then they recovered to $1\frac{1}{8}$, but have again relapsed. All manner of rumours had been propagated, and it is difficult to see one's way quite clearly. The Founders' shares also fluctuated very widely, but I should not be surprised if at the special settlement at the end of the month a large "Bear" account were to be disclosed, and as there are only 5,000 of these, there may be some curious developments. By the amalgamation of the Golden Link, the Eclipse, Hesperus, and Great Boulder East Extended, a very important and promising combination has been formed. The properties owned by these four Companies comprise 95 acres, situated in the heart of the Hannan's district of Western Australia. Upwards of £200,000 additional capital has been subscribed, out of which £50,000 in cash is at once available, while £8,000 worth of machinery is already in Western Australia. A considerable saving in the cost of administration will, of course, be effected, as one Board of Directors will take the place of four; and other expenses should also be reduced. Under these circumstances, and in view of the favourable reports made on the different properties, the Golden Link Consolidated Gold Mines, Limited, should have a promising future before it. I have received a number of inquiries from shareholders in the Finance Corporation of Western Australia who complain of being kept in the dark by the Directors. I suppose that no favourable news is available, or else no doubt the Board would have published it quickly enough. I dare say that Lord Fingall is animated with the best intentions in proposing to hand over to the Londonderry shareholders his profits on the Londonderry deal by taking an interest in a new promotion, viz., the Australia United Mining Company, Limited. But it would have been preferable if the two Companies had not been mixed up, and if he had merely transferred the amount of his profit on the Londonderry promotion to independent parties to act for the Company. I do not for a moment doubt his bona-fides, but it is somewhat difficult to establish what the profit will be on such a transaction.

Indian, New Zealand, and Other Mines.

The Indian mining section has shown dulness in sympathy with the rest of the Mining market, notwithstanding the excellent September returns. Mysore, Champion Reefs, and Ooregum have led the decline, and even the very cheap Goldfields of Mysore have further eased off, but an early rally is quite on the cards. In Australian shares, other than West Australian, Aladdin's Lamp are somewhat easier at $2\frac{9}{16}$. In Charters Towers mines slight improvements are marked in New Queen and Brilliant, and St. George United; but Day Dawn Block are lower. Mount Morgan and Broken Hill Proprietary have also given way. Although no further advance has taken place in Croydon Consols, which stand at 8s. 6d., there is every reason to anticipate an important rise in these shares on the announcement of the substantial dividend of 1s. per share which I have already predicted. In New Zealand shares a slight recovery is marked in Waihi Silverton; but Consolidated Gold Fields of New Zealand are again very much lower, and there has also been a relapse in New Zealand Joint-Stock Trust, Waihi, Thames Hauraki, Kapanga, and a few of the other low-priced shares. In the general foreign department Rio Tinto have failed to maintain the highest quotation, notwithstanding the excellent interim dividend of 18s. per share; and copper shares generally are dull in sympathy with the rest of the international market. A rise in Frontino and Bolivia was almost the only favourable movement in this section. On the other hand, Burma Ruby, Golden Feather, Montano, Columbian Hydraulic, and De Lamar are all lower. On September 10 I asked the question as to who was behind the San Joaquim Gold Mining Company, Victoria, B.C., as the surroundings on this side did not by any means appear promising. I have not received any answer to this question; but a mining expert writes to me from Toronto stating that this property is in the Traill District of British Columbia, and is a prospect, not a mine. Although he does not condemn the property, it is evident that on the capitalisation of the concern as offered on this side, this would be a most undesirable venture. What chiefly concerns me in the Toronto communication is the complaint on the part of Canadian readers of Truth that their interests are not sufficiently represented in my remarks under the Mining market, and that I ignore more especially the Traill District of British Columbia, which has leaped into great prominence in America by reason of the rich gold deposits found there. I have not ignored British Columbia, as my correspondent will find on referring to recent issues of Truth; but there is great reason to doubt the bona-fides of certain of the British Columbian concerns which have been offered here, and although some of the developments in the district mentioned have been satisfactory, the time has not arrived to recommend indiscriminate investment in such concerns. My correspondent sends me a list of quotations of mining Companies taken from the Toronto Star, and also subjoins a list of the best properties according to his lights. But he really must excuse my not being able to place such a list before my readers, as at the present stage of development I am not prepared to incur so serious a responsibility. Whenever British Columbia, and the Traill district more particularly, is able to point to large crushings I shall not be backward in drawing attention to the results obtained.

New Enterprises and Issues.

The prospectuses of the following new Companies and issues have been placed before the public during the week:—

Peabody and Berkshire Gold Mines, Limited.—This Company has been formed to acquire two gold mining properties known as the Peabody and the northern half of Berkshire, comprising about sixty-five acres in all, situated within two and a-half miles of a railway station, and about 200 miles of Melbourne. The capital is £100,000 in shares of £1 each.

Sir Christopher Furness, Westgarth, & Co., Limited.—This Company has been formed for acquiring the marine, general engines, and boiler manufacturing business of Messrs. Westgarth, English, & Co., of Middlesbrough. The capital is fixed at £250,000, divided into Ordinary and Preference shares of £5 each.

Considering the unsettled state of the shipbuilding trade just now, I hardly think this issue will meet with a favourable reception.

Dominion of Canada, City of St. Catherines, Ontario.—This is an issue of £75,924 12s. Four per Cent. Thirty Year Sterling General Consolidated Loan debentures to bearer of £100 each, with half-yearly coupons attached. The principal is repayable in London at par in 1926. The issue price is £102 per cent. Applications are to be made to Messrs. Coates, Son, & Co., of Gresham-street, E.C.

Clément, Gladiator, and Humber (France) Limited.—This Company has been formed for the purpose of amalgamating the French cycle businesses known as La Société des Velocipédes Clément, la Société Française des Cycles Gladiator, and the French business of Humber & Co., Limited. The share capital is fixed at £900,000 divided into 200,000 Six per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares and 700,000 Ordinary shares of £1 each.

The demand for cycles is still on the increase in la belle France, and by the amalgamation of these Companies a monopoly for this class of vehicles will practically be established in that country. The profits for the past two years have amounted for the two first Companies to over £87,000, while the vendor guarantees to the Company £80,000 as the profit for the year 1896. This is without taking into consideration the profits that may have accrued in the past year, or which may accrue in future, to the Humber business. The issue is made under the auspices of the same strong group who so successfully brought out the Dunlop Company, so that there can be little doubt that this will be carried to an equally successful result.

The Golden Link Consolidated Gold Mines, Limited.—This Company has been formed for the purpose of amalgamating and taking over as going concerns the Golden Link, the Eclipse, and the Hesperus Gold Mines and other Companies. The capital is £550,000, in shares of £1 each.

This is in my opinion a wise amalgamation of working mines, as the expenses will be considerably reduced, and there is a reduction of over £13,000 in the issued capital, upon which dividends will be payable. The new Company will also acquire upwards of £50,000 in cash and £8,000 worth of machinery, which is already in Australia, while the substantial sum of £200,000 will be in reserve for the acquiring of further properties and other contingencies.

The Tomingley Gold Mines, Limited.—This Company has been formed to acquire seven gold mining leases situated in the town of Tomingley, county of Narromine, New South Wales, of about 51½ acres in extent. The property is about 22½ miles from Narromine, from which there is a direct communication to Sydney. The capital is £110,000 in £1 shares.

I have carefully perused the prospectus and can see nothing in it that would be of any advantage to my readers. The property is very little developed, and the capital is, in my opinion, excessive.

Lady Hampton Consolidated Gold Mines, Limited.—This Company has been formed to purchase and work eighty acres of auriferous ground, about two and a half miles of the town of Coolgardie, Western Australia. The capital is fixed at £250,000 in shares of £1 each.

I have repeatedly cautioned my readers against investing in undeveloped properties. It is far better to look after those that are—or will in the very near future be—giving returns. The West Australian market at the present moment appears to be overdone, and it will be as well for promoters to give it a rest, and develop their properties while resting.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

Liverpool Broker.—No reason to sell Chilians now; but as an investment a purchase of the new Uruguay loan would be preferable. Frigate.—No reason to sell Chilians of 1892.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

Rollo.—I cannot make a sweeping statement like that you ask me to do. The Parent Company is well managed; but I should not recommend investment in all its sub-Companies. J. W.—I cannot reply by letter, and regret that it is impossible for me to recommend individual stockbrokers. A. F.—I should think that the coming issue of Six per Cent. First Mortgage Sterling Debentures of £100 each at par by the Mexican Cotton Estates should suit you for the purpose of permanent investment. The security is ample, and the surroundings are highly respectable. See remarks under "Various Investments." Cheylesmore.—With reference to the proposed investment of £10,000, I think it would be preferable to await the course of the Money Market before placing the same, as a rise in rates might assist you in obtaining gilt-edged securities somewhat lower than at the present range of values. Erskine.—Why not put your money into the new Uruguay Loan, which yields upwards of 7 per cent. per annum? The new Mexican Industrial First Mortgage Six per Cent. Debentures, which will be offered next week and are referred to by me under "Various Investments," should more especially suit you. H. T. E.—The same applies to this outside concern. T. H. M.—Yes, this is a good investment.

Home Rails.

H. W. B., Manchester.—A fair investment, but no catch. A Constant Reader, Salisbury.—The present quotation of the East London Third Debenture Charge is 6-11; but I do not consider a lock-up very promising. Curator.—Yes, hold Caledonian Deferred (Coras) for an improvement.

American and Foreign Rails.

Agra.—There seems to be every prospect of an improvement in Norfolk and Western Prefs. Trefusis.—1. There seems to be no fear of this. 2. I should not recommend a purchase of the other debentures now. F. M. C.—As far as I can ascertain, no fresh circumstance has arisen. R. P., Manchester.—Amongst the low-priced stocks some of the best purchases are Erie Prefs. and Ordinary, Southern Prefs. and Ordinary, and Union Pacifics. J. M., Glasgow.—No reason to sell Grand Trunk Four per Cent. Debenture stock. Renfrew.—You ought to have received your Atchison certificates. Apply to Messrs. Baring Bros. & Co. on the subject. I suppose that you deposited your shares. H. E. W.—1. You should certainly not sell these bonds now; the course of the American Railroad market will upon the whole apparently be upward. 2. You can make the change later on. Rio Grande.—It is a pity that you have to realise some of these bonds, and as No. 4 is least depreciated, perhaps you had better sell these.

Mining Shares.

Novice.—1. Hold; but do not buy more. 2. I must refer you to my letter. T. W. D.—I should advise you to hold Waterfall Estates for an advance by all means. A. G.—I do not like Steyn Estates (A). B is a fairly promising mine; but in view of the present state of the market you will have to exercise patience. Rajputana.—There is nothing new about Langlaagte Block B; the mine is doing well, and should eventually pay dividends. The fall in the price has been caused by the present slump. R. W.—I should say that the Nundydroog has the best prospects of the two mines mentioned. W. C. W.—After the heavy decline, it will be best to hold for a recovery. You have bought Consolidated Goldfields at over £16 and Chartered at £5, altogether against my advice; what can I tell you now? Moscow.—No option but to join the reconstruction and sell after. Nemo, Belmullet.—I do not advise purchase of Klerksdorp even at that price. Interested.—No option but to hold until the South African market generally improves. Nella.—I have always held a bad opinion of Broad Arrow Gold Mines, and have repeatedly said so. New Club.—Before the amalgamation of the London and Globe Finance and West Australian Exploring and Finance is carried out in a month or two large dividends will be paid on both. Atho, Liverpool.—I have always warned my readers not to embark in Dickens Custer. You cannot be a regular reader of Truth. Nemo, Locherbie.—1. The Hill End Consols is considered a promising mine. I do not like the other concerns. Nix.—I should think it would be wise to accept the shares, but you must take your own decision. H. Co.—Yes, you should hold Great Boulder South. Hampton Plains are very promising, and should be held. I do not accept any fee. Jacobus.—I do not like this concern at all. Scipio.—Write to the secretary for information. State.—No, I do not advise the purchase of Hannan's True Blue. Hernica.—1. Yes, a fair mining risk. 2. Ditto. Audax.—No option but to hold all your mining shares, No. 1 to 12, for an improvement in the Mining market generally. Caldee.—You have done right to buy Croydon Consols. This mine is doing remarkably well. Amongst the Companies mentioned by you I prefer London and Globe Finance (1), West Australian Exploring and Finance (2), and Randfontein (5). I should not advise purchase of the others. W. A.—No option but to hold for a recovery, but do not average yet. Belshazzer.—No particular temptation to buy Nos. 1 and 2 now. Haco.—This is not the time to sell your Mining shares, Nos. 1-7. Hold for a recovery. F. S. R.—1. A further advance in Croydon Consols is expected, in view of the early announcement of a 1s. dividend, or upwards of 20 per cent. in the 5s. shares, 4s. 6d. paid. No reason to sell Nos. 2 and 3. I still hold an unfavourable opinion of Lisbon Berlyn (4) and Barretts (5). No option but to hold No. 6. Keynote.—I advise you to have nothing to do with the Rip Gold Mining Company. Vigo.—A fair mining risk, but by no means a catch. W. K.—I see no particular reason for buying them now. Arick.—No temptation to buy Phœnix (1) or Nos. 2 and 3. You can do better in the shares mentioned in my letter. 4. Hardly likely. Dubious, Croydon.—I. Yes, I expect an improvement both in Hannan's Proprietary and in Mysore Goldfields. II. As yet the position of Orion is much involved. III. They have recently acquired a further adjoining claim. Messrs. Elmslie & Co. will be able to give you all particulars. Bonâ Fides.—This is a bad time to sell New Jagersfontein. You had better await a general recovery in the Mining Market, which is, in fact, now in progress. Evertonian.—No, I do not recommend purchase of Montana. J. A. O.—I think that your most sanguine expectations will be exceeded by the London and Globe Finance and the West Australian Exploring and Finance, and you should hold for a further big rise. Careful, Kirknewton.—1. No doubt there is a connection. I should prefer W.A. Joint Stock Trust. 2. At a slight premium. 3. Yes, a fair purchase. Yorks.—All your mining shares should be held for an improvement. I do not, however, like the outlook of Cumberland Land. Croydon Consols.—I am glad to hear you are doing so well in Croydon Consols and North Croydon Consols on my advice. Your other shares should all be held for a rise. As regards other shares to buy I must refer you to my letter. H. B., Hull.—I do not see how you can do this. Mars.—Neither of the issues is particularly promising. Celt.—1. Impossible to give exact dates. If you are a shareholder write to the secretary. 2. I am unable to tell. 3. Shortly. Cornubian.—1. Yes, a good firm and members of the Stock Exchange. 2. London and Globe Finance are now advancing and are expected to go much higher. You should hold. 3. You should buy more Croydon Consols, the next dividend will be 1s. per share. 4. I am afraid you cannot do much in the matter of contangos with local firms, you should employ a member of the London Stock Exchange. 5. Hannan's Napier should be held. 6. Yes, hold Langlaagte Star. The tide is turning. 7. No unfavourable news seems to hand. Primrose.—Certainly hold, and disregard such exaggerated statements. Pembroke.—No option but to hold your shares Nos. 1-10 for a recovery, when you should sell such as Dickens Custer and Brookman's Boulder. Perplexity.—It appeared at one time as if the settlement of the W.A. (Gold District) Trading Company had passed off satisfactorily, but the market is again irregular. It is, however, likely that the "Bears" will be caught. Hold both Ordinary and Founders' shares. Sub, Newcastle.—1. A fair mining risk. 2. Ditto. Plunger.—No option but to hold all your shares, Nos. 1 to 6, for an improvement. You are quite right, sell Buffelskloof (7) and Flagstaff (8), and reinvest in London and Globe. Archipelago.—Do not go in for the so-called cheap shares. Amongst the mines mentioned by you I like only Nos. 4. I should prefer to advise West Australian Exploring and Finance, Hannan's Golden Treasure and Golden Group, Gladiators, Randfontein, and Johnnies. W. C. L. L.—The most promising among the West Australians mentioned by you are Hampton Plains (1), W.A. Joint-Stock Trust, W.A. (Gold District) Trading Corporation, and Hannan's Golden Treasure. Inquirer, Manchester.—There is no market for Southern Klerksdorp. Koma.—1. A fair mining risk, but still somewhat undeveloped. 2. I have never said a word in praise of Hauraki Associated. 3. You can get separate Australian or South African mining guides through Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange, London, E.C. Victim.—Most of your mines are utter rubbish, and I can only advise you to get out of them if you can. Eta.—I think you have made a very good selection of mines Nos. 1-5, especially Randfontein and Johnnies. You cannot go far wrong in buying Hampton Plains, London and Globe, and W.A. Joint Stock Trust. Rob Roy, Sunderland.—I do not think you ought to go so heavily into one particular group. It would be quite enough for you to buy No. 2 in that group, and distribute the rest over some of the shares recommended above to "Archipelago." Divi.—I still am of opinion that the cheap mining share in question will eventually improve. Do not buy the other shares yet. Butterfly.—There is no option but to hold your shares Nos. 1-12, although the shares are badly selected. A recovery in the general mining market would help you to get out much better. No. 10 is a bad egg. J. G., Birmingham.—I have a very bad opinion of Monastery Diamonds and should advise you not to have anything to do with them. Foko.—Ignorant comment, which should be disregarded. A good many of your Westralians are well selected, and you should hold for a recovery. Honeygate.—Nos. 1-3 are fair Mining risks and should be held. I again say that I do not like Sam's Wealth of Nations, and I do not think much of the Ramage Syndicate, the shares in which are too high now. Meph.—(a) Write to the Secretary. (b) The report looks promising. No option but to hold c, d, and e. As regards your question f the order of merit should be No. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9, and 10. Lillium.—No option but to hold your shares Nos 1-7, nearly all of which were selected against my advice, notably North Boulder, Norman Proprietary, and London and British Columbia. Ajax, Plymouth.—As a general rule, hold all Mining shares for a recovery, and certainly stick to Nos. 6, 7, and 8. The others should be sold on a recovery. J. W. W.—Yes. E. Corner.—I have ere this expressed an unfavourable opinion of the George Goch, and still do so. H. W. B.—Both City and Suburban and Simmer and Jack are cheap at present price. Depressed.—I still think it is advisable to hold, although Hannan's Golden Treasure are distinctly more promising. A Shareholder.—I have never expressed any favourable opinion of the Mount Malcolm Proprietary Gold Mines, and therefore cannot consider that it is my duty to give it special attention. The shareholders should, of course, oppose any such alteration, of the articles as are mischievous. W. G.—Yes; I advise you to keep your New Primrose. John J. D.—I do not recommend purchase of Nos. 1, 2, or 4 just now. Barnato Banks (3) are a good purchase. My view of Wealth of Nations has not changed, and the circular is promising. G. S.—1. Yes, hold. 2. A recovery is not improbable. 3. No. J. R., Barnsbury.—I cannot say that I approve of this purchase. D. E. G.—Yes; I still think that New Primrose. Glencairn, and Buffelsdoorn should be held for a marked recovery. J. J. E.—No reason to sell Mainland Consols (1) or Reine d'Or (2). Hold also No. 3. Bradford.—Hold Croydon Consols for a further important rise. Beaulieu.—1. You should make your selection from the shares mentioned in my letter. 2. The Financial News. 3. Yes; Uruguay are a good investment. Indian Queen.—1. Probably. 2. Write to the Secretary, and hold the shares. 3. Not just yet. 4. Five hundred dollars. 5. Yes; they are too low. 6. Yes, as there is a better market for them. 7. I cannot tell. 8. Yes, Mr. Charles Kaufman's presence in England in about a fortnight should be very important for the mines with which he is connected. D. M. C., Kirkaldy.—I have no special information as to the present position of Spes Bona. The Directors should give full information. Trams.—All the shares Nos. 1-4 are promising. I would not recommend purchase of No. 5 just now. No special reason as regards Nos. 6 and 7. The last-mentioned concern appears to be doing well now. La Hechicern.—Yes, it is the right title; £1 shares fully paid, present price $3\frac{1}{16}$, and suitable for permanent investment. Howard.—1. You should not sell during the present slump. 2. Not that I know of. 3. More than present price. 4. Hold. 5. Yes, eventually. Fip.—You should disregard such one-sided criticism. Rob.—1. No option but to hold for the present. 2. Eventually these should come right. Hold Nos. 3 and 4. No option but to hold Buffelsdoorn (5). No, I have heard nothing more as regards No. 6. Disgusted.—Lord Fingall's proposals will no doubt be made in due time, and must be awaited. As regards the other concern, I am afraid it does not look promising.

Industrial Shares.

Springfield.—A fair investment, but no catch. C. M., West Norwood.—Johannis Table Water shares are quite high enough. Mrs. V.—I regret for your sake that you should have invested in the Rosario City Improvements; but I do not see how I can help you at present. E. T., Doncaster.—No reason to sell any of your shares Nos. 1 to 8 just now; but I do not advise a purchase of A and B. Ossian.—Very little is known here about this Irish concern, and I should not like to advise you. Coals to Newcastle.—A fair investment. D. B. S.—I do not like your shares Nos. 1 to 3; you should take an opportunity to get out. Imara.—I do not like this concern at all. South Kensington.—It is very difficult to give advice upon this subject; but, upon the whole, I do not consider the proposal very favourable. H. N. G.—Yes; the Second Debentures under the circumstances are a very fair investment. Glentana.—Maple & Co. (1) is a good investment, and so is No. 2; but Nos. 3 and 4 are high enough, and newspaper shares like No. 5 are very speculative.

Mixed Investments.

W. N., Nottingham.—With reference to your holdings Nos. 1 to 7, I see no reason for selling Nos. 1, 3, and 4. The others I do not like, least of all Sam's Wealth of Nations. Clarewin, Edinbro'.—You should certainly hold Hannan's Golden Treasure (1) and Hannan's Golden Group (2). No reason to sell any of the other West Australian shares Nos. 1, 6, 9, 13, and 14. The South Africans, too, should be held now, as the market will, doubtless, improve. Sell No. 15 whenever you see a small profit. T. D. C.—1. No, not much; but the Bank is sound enough. 2. No; leave them alone. 3. High enough just now. Ruby.—I do not recommend purchase of the Music-hall shares Nos. 2 and 3; but Nos. 1, 4, 5, 6, and 7 are promising. G. K. G.—1. Quite high enough. 2. All depends upon whether you have reliable information from insiders. 3. No reason to sell. 4. These are also promising. Garge.—1. The exchange would be advisable. 2. A fair mining risk, but no catch. 3. Do not put too many eggs into one basket. Atalanta.—I do not advise sale of any of these shares at present; but if you must sell some you had better realise No. 3. Yorks.—1. It would, perhaps, be preferable to join the dissentient shareholders. 2. Ditto. Tyke.—A. Sell on an improvement. B. A fair investment. 3. Hold North British for a rise, and buy more to average. R. M. H.—1. The fear about Spanish Fours is that Spanish finance might break down altogether. 2. I do not advise investment in the Midland Fire Corporation. 3. No. Cardiff.—1. No market at present, and no option but to hold. 2. Quite high enough. Brabant.—1. Not just yet. 2. I cannot tell. 3. No reason to sell these Argentine Railway shares. 4. You must tell me what yield you require. Thistle.—1. I do not like these, nor No. 2. Lland.—1. A fair mining risk. 2. No reason to sell now. Certainly, keep Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 7. No. 8 is a fair industrial concern, and you should also certainly keep Nos. 9 and 10. Manchester Boy.—1. I do not recommend investment in Colonial bonds and other high-class English securities just now, as they are likely to give way further. 2. The issue of Six per Cent First Mortgage Sterling Debentures of £100 each at par by the Mexican Cotton Estates about to be made is a first-rate Mexican investment, and I think should suit you. See remarks under Various Investments. Peter Piper.—No option but to hold Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5, which are likely to improve. No. 4 should eventually go better. Bookworm.—It seems a pity to sell any of these stocks, but perhaps you had better get rid of No. 4, as you are bound to sell. No. 5 should recover again. Ereunetes.—1. I know nothing of the tea and coffee companies A and B, and should not like to commit myself to an opinion on the subject. 2. No option but to hold; they should improve further. 3. Fair prospects, no reason to sell. R. H.—1. Yes. 2. I do not like the Leeds Forge Company at all. 3. I do not think much of this Australian Mine. Par.—Golden River Quesnelle and Moanataiari are good properties. The shares in the former stand at a small premium, and in the latter at $1\frac{3}{8}$-$\frac{1}{4}$. Uruguay bonds are suitable for permanent investment. X. Y. Z., Bristol.—No special reason for selling Nos. 1 to 13. Shilling.—1. I quite agree with you that a meeting of the Troye Exploration Company should be held shortly, so that the shareholders should be enlightened as to the position. 2. The position of such Rhodesian Companies has of course suffered through the native insurrection; eventually they should go better. 3. I do not like Geldfontein Estates. 4. Not yet. 5. When the weak "Bulls" are all cleared out, South Africans are all likely to recover.

Various Investments.

Small fluctuations in the Money Market nowadays suffice to affect the gilt-edged class of securities, from Consols downwards, and the views entertained as to the future of the Money Market change from day to day. One day we are told that the Directors of the Bank of England will have to put the rate down again, the next day, when a few hundred thousand pounds in gold are withdrawn, people already begin to talk of a rise in the rate to 4. This is really too absurd; a 3 or 3½ per cent. Bank rate will not hurt anybody, and I doubt greatly whether we shall see anything higher than this in the present year. Consols have reacted to 108⅞, and so far the sellers of the premier security have scored. Colonial Government bonds and India stock are falling away again, and I certainly think that a further decline in these, as well as in Home Railway Prior Charges, would be fully justified. There has been a fresh fall in silver to 29⅞d., and the word is now passed round that American holders will not sell below that price; but I should not like to pin my faith to that report, and personally I look for a further fall in silver on the discomfiture of Mr. Bryan at the Presidential elections. Rupee Paper has dropped to 60⅞, partly in sympathy with silver, but also on the failure of the crops in India. In Cycle shares a steady business has been transacted, and Beestons have improved to 4¼, most other changes being trifling. The strength of Dunlop Deferred at a substantial premium, however, has been a feature throughout, and is of happy augury for the success of Clément, Gladiator, and Humber (France), Limited, the issue of which is made under the same auspices, and which may be expected to be backed equally well. A point about the prospectus is that it is claimed that the profits of the two purely French undertakings will suffice to pay 9 per cent. on the Ordinary after payment of the Preference dividend, not reckoning the profits of the French Humber business. By the way, a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum has just been declared on Dunlop Deferred. Brewery shares have been quiet, and Allsopps have eased off to 167½, while Guinness Ordinary are quoted 540. There is not at present much prospect of active dealings in this class of stock. On the other hand I look for considerable interest being taken in the near future in Mexican industrial enterprises. Mexico is prospering in a remarkable manner, and has altogether risen superior to the silver trouble. Agriculture and commerce are expanding, and industrial undertakings follow in their wake. The exceptional promise of the position is illustrated by the splendid traffics of the Mexican Railway (Vera Cruz Line). I hear of the coming issue of Six per Cent. First Mortgage Sterling debentures of £100 each at par secured on a sound industrial undertaking, viz., the Mexican Cotton Estates. The issue will be made under influential auspices, and the great security of the debentures will be illustrated by the fact that the net profits are more than three times the amount required to pay interest on them. The prospectus will probably appear next Saturday, and my readers who are in want of a safe investment yielding a high interest should give it every attention. I may mention that the Resident Board of the Company in the City of Mexico is of a very high class, including, besides eminent merchants, two Directors of the Banco Nacional de Mexico, and two Directors of the Bank of London and Mexico. In reply to several inquiries with reference to Gray & Gilbert, Limited, a Company which was formed a short time ago for the purchase of several well-known wholesale and retail businesses, I should think that this undertaking has in it the elements of success. According to the reports of the accountants, the total average yearly net profit was £29,288, while the interest on the Six per Cent. Preference shares, and 10 per cent. on the Ordinary, amounts to only £14,000, so that a surplus of £15,288 is available for administration, reserve fund, and further dividends. Several of the circulars issued by Frank Barlow, Stock and Share Dealer, 7, Leadenhall-street, London, E.C., have been sent to me. In these the "puff preliminary" is given to a Company about to be launched for the purpose of rebuilding and running the Savoy Theatre of Varieties, Dublin. I know nothing of the prospective merits of this promotion; but I should think that such preliminary announcements addressed to complete strangers by outside dealers tend rather to damage a concern than otherwise. The coming flotation of the Bovril Company on new large lines has caused a sharp advance in the shares. I hear that a Company will shortly be formed for bringing out the Minerva Nailless Horse Shoe, which appears to have scored a considerable success in Germany, the shares in the German Company standing at a high premium. It is claimed that the new shoe is also being adopted in this country.—Your affectionate uncle, MOSES.

No aperient water can boast of such sure and beneficial purgative efficacy as the "Franz Josef." It was known on the Continent twenty years ago, and is now sold everywhere.

QUEER STORY.

THE CANON'S CESAREWITCH.

SIR JOHN KENDRIC was not a man who had enjoyed particularly good luck upon the turf; and the general impression, in well-informed circles, was that he had now pretty well run to the end of his financial tether. He had started life with a large estate; and, when he first went upon the turf, had lavished huge sums in forming for himself an extensive and expensive stud. But though he purchased animals of the finest pedigree, and bred many youngsters of exceptional strain, his successes were not at all proportionate to his outlay; in fact, scarcely a season passed, at the end of which he did not find himself heavily out of pocket. Once or twice, certainly, his horses had done great things. It may be remembered how his famous colt, The Bishop, won the Derby, starting at a longish price; and how his filly, Sister Mary Martha, a few years later, upset all calculations in the One Thousand. But these were almost his only conspicuous successes. His other victories were scored in comparatively minor events, and were far from numerous even in those. The result was that the Baronet—at the time of which we write—was actually hovering on the verge of bankruptcy. His town house had been sold, his country estates mortgaged to the hilt, and he himself was compelled to retire into economical seclusion at his Wiltshire seat—which he had in vain tried to let, and where he lived in one wing of the house, with two or three servants, leaving the rest of the mansion to the bats, rats, and cockroaches.

Only one animal now remained to him of all his numerous stud. This was the famous mare, Sister Mary Martha, whom he still refused to sell, and whom he took down with him into Wiltshire. She was understood to be in foal to The Bishop. And Sir John cherished a lingering hope that her offspring might turn out to be a flyer, and in some degree help to recoup him for his many ruinous losses. His friends said that he was a fool to refuse £7,000 for the mare, as he had actually done; and some of them pressed him to reconsider his determination. Sir John, however, remained obstinate. He never did pay much attention to advice. It was not his way. He valued himself upon his own level-headed 'cuteness too much for that. And he was 'cute, not a doubt of it. If anything, perhaps he was too 'cute, for over-'cuteness frequently defeats itself by always pursuing tortuous paths; whereas it often happens that the straightest road is the one that pays the best to follow. Many such men are to be met with; men so addicted to cunning that the thing becomes a mania with them. This it had practically done with Sir John. It gave him more pleasure to land £10,000 by judicious jockeying than £20,000 by fair and legitimate methods. And no doubt this passion of his for sharp practice had as much as anything else to do with his failure upon the turf.

With the above weakness was linked, in his case, a strong element of superstition. Probably most gamblers have that quality more or less clearly developed in them, and in Sir John it was very conspicuous. While no material methods of compassing his shady objects were neglected by him, he paid the greatest heed to immaterial influences—to dreams, presentiments, omens, and such like; so much so as frequently to arouse the open ridicule of his practical associates. But the Baronet pursued his way, as impervious to their ridicule as he was deaf to their advice. No amount of experience could teach him wisdom. Even when he stood on the verge of bankruptcy, he still clung to the belief that it only needed a little more perseverance in his favourite methods to ensure him ultimate success; and that after a steady course of failure through twenty years.

When Sister Mary Martha had been down at her owner's Wiltshire stables for a few months, the expected foal arrived. It was in the midst of surroundings by no means adequate to his strain and pedigree that this distinguished colt-foal was ushered into a troublesome existence. The greater portion of the stables had been shut up, and Sir John had only one groom—an old family servant—upon the premises. The Baronet himself took an active share in looking after the one or two horses that he kept there; and he, his groom, and a local vet. from Salisbury were Sister Mary Martha's attendants when her foal was born. The event created no sensation in the neighbourhood. The bumpkins in that out-of-the-world place knew little, and cared less, about turf intelligence. To them the circumstance that a son had been born to The Bishop and Sister Mary Martha was without importance. If Tummas Node's white zow had farrowed a dozen, or Bill Andrew's mottled hen had hatched fourteen out of a sitting of fifteen, it would have made more stir in the village. Amid such unappreciative surroundings was The Canon foaled.

This name (by which Sir John designated him within a few hours of his birth) was obviously appropriate. But it was not merely the appropriateness of the designation that had induced his owner thus to style him. Allusion has been made to the superstitious element in Sir John's character. To this, more than to anything else, the Canon owed his name. The extraordinary and wonderful good luck which had attended Sir John in the matter of the Bishop—(the story of whose Derby victory is too well known to need repetition)—had aroused in Sir John a sort of blind faith in ecclesiastical nomenclature. And that faith had been rather confirmed by the career of Sister Mary Martha. True, there had also been many examples among his horses which contradicted this idea. His The Dean, The Vicar, and The Archdeacon had all failed conspicuously. His St. Agnes and Mother Superior had turned out worthless, both in their turf and stud careers. But this did not put Sir John off the Church. His obstinacy was impenetrable. And if he once got a notion into his head, there it became a fixture.

The Baronet's friends, who had urged him to accept the offer of £7,000 for Sister Mary Martha, had reason, ere long, to plume themselves upon their own superior wisdom and foresight. The mare went through her foaling-time badly. For some weeks it was feared that she would actually lose her life, and though that catastrophe was happily averted, she only recovered with such loss of strength and condition as hopelessly impaired her value for sale or use. Sir John's friends opined that he must feel dreadfully "sick" over his own folly; of which—like all true friends—they took good care to give him frequent reminders. It was, however, characteristic of our Baronet never to admit himself in the wrong. He maintained, with unflinching persistence, that he had adopted the wisest course, and that The Canon would certainly far more than compensate him for losing £7,000 over Sister Mary Martha. The colt was as likely a one as he had ever seen, and it was odds on his turning out a flyer. His wise friends were altogether too previous. Let them wait a year or two, and then they would change their note.

That year or two went by. And, in the course of them, The Canon entered upon his turf career. He proved himself less of a treasure than his owner had prophesied; though more valuable than Sir John's friends had imagined probable. He was unquestionably speedy. In fact, at his own distance he could make a race of it with the best. But that distance was only about seven furlongs. He was utterly deficient in stamina. He could never stay a yard farther. At a mile and a quarter a hack would have beaten him. At a mile and a half he could not have given two pounds to a donkey. The result was that his field of operations was narrowly limited. He seldom failed to win in a T.Y.C. scramble. But in all the longer races he was hopelessly beaten. As a consequence, most of the richest events in the Calendar were out of his reach.

In this respect, he reproduced (to an exaggerated extent) the characteristic weakness of his dam, but differed entirely from his famous sire. The Bishop, as is well known, had stayed the Cup course at Ascot and won against a strong lot; but Sister Mary Martha had always cracked up if she were called upon to gallop more than a mile and a quarter, and was really at her best inside a mile. If The Canon had developed even that degree of staying power, he might have enjoyed a fairly brilliant career. But he proved himself incapable of it, cutting up so shockingly, whenever he was run beyond his distance, that no one ever dreamed of backing him for anything but the shortest races.

Here again Sir John Kendric showed a dense obstinacy that was quite remarkable in so 'cute a man. Though The Canon proved, time after time, his utter lack of stamina, his owner either could not, or would not, bring himself to realise it. He would persist in running him in races that were outside his distance; and when the colt failed, as in these events he did every time, Sir John always had some excuse to urge—the hard ground, the heavy going, bad judgment on the part of the jockey, an unfair start, and any number more such reasons, which were about as numerous, and as likely, as those of a recusant debtor. The baronet averred, and affected to believe, that a son of The Bishop could not be a non-stayer. He must have the grit in him, could it only be brought out. It was useless for his friends to argue and expostulate. Sir John took no notice, but went on in his obstinate way, messing the colt about in impossible races with a fatuousness almost past belief.

But the climax of his folly was reached, when he actually accepted, on behalf of his colt, for the Cesarewitch. The sporting world could hardly believe its ears when it learned the astounding intelligence. How could a horse for whom a Derby or a Leger course was half a mile too long be expected to negotiate the longer and more punishing Cesarewitch? The Canon should have been scratched a year ago. It was ridiculous, idiotic, to leave him in. Any bookie would be glad to lay 200 to 1 against the colt, and think he had favourable terms. Certainly, he was saddled by the handicapper with a merely nominal weight. But what of that? If he only had to carry a grasshopper, The Canon could never finish the Cesarewitch course. One explanation alone was feasible. Sir John must be going "dotty." No sane man could have acted with such inconceivable idiocy.

As a matter of fact, Sir John was not in the least "dotty," though his mad behaviour seemed to favour the contention. It was superstition, not insanity, which was guiding him in this matter. Some of his friends who remonstrated with him even more strongly than usual managed to elicit that much from the taciturn baronet. He was acting on a presentiment, fostered by some absurd dream, in which he had (visionally) seen his colt win over the long course at Newmarket. This dream had clearly taken a tremendous hold on him, despite its defiance of all physical possibilities; and neither reason nor ridicule could deter him from his fatuous folly in starting the colt.

"But, my dear John," said an intimate friend one day, speaking with excusable vehemence, "this presentiment of yours is all transparent bosh! A hedgehog could beat The Canon over the Cesarewitch course."

"You may have your opinion, but I have mine," said Sir John, obstinately.

"It isn't only my opinion; it's the opinion of every man on the Turf. You'll see that no single soul will dream of investing a halfpenny on The Canon's chance."

"There's one soul who will—myself. I shall back him for all I am worth."

"Psha! This is stark, staring madness. It is courting a smash!"

"I'm pretty near smashed already," answered Sir

John, smiling with provoking calmness. "And my one chance is to go nap. You may think me an idiot. Possibly I am; but I believe in dreams and presentiments, and I am convinced that I shall land the odds. Come, you are an old pal, and I should like to put you on to a good thing. Will you stand in with me?"

"No, thank you—not I!" said his friend, hastily. And he argued no more with Sir John. It was simply a waste of breath, he saw, to urge reason upon a man in his state—one who was simply inviting ruin to descend and overwhelm him.

The Baronet had for some years given up his professional trainer; the fees and expenses being heavier than he was able to meet. And he now set himself, with the aid of his experienced groom, to train The Canon for his Newmarket engagement. That he would turn out his colt in capital condition, nobody doubted. For Sir John understood this branch of the business as well as Porter or Dawson themselves. But no amount of condition could put stamina into a non-stayer, and the unanimous opinion of the whole racing world was that the owner of The Canon was simply wasting his time and skill on a hopeless horse. What a pity, they all declared, that Sir John should be the victim of this marvellous infatuation! If only he could have freed himself from his absurd superstition, he might even now, with his great natural shrewdness, have pulled himself round into a tolerable financial state. As it was, he was deliberately jumping over a pecuniary precipice. And the punters began to offer odds on his name appearing in the Gazette before Christmas. No one, however, could be found to take them. The certainty was too pronounced.

In due course, the day of the Cesarewitch arrived. Sir John's action had naturally excited widespread remark, and when the candidates for the big handicap turned out in the preliminary canter, The Canon was watched by the crowd with considerable interest. He was a beautiful colt, a pure light chestnut, and his glossy coat and general air of "fitness" showed him to be in the pink of condition. His action, also, was magnificent—the perfection of ease and grace. But that every one knew already, and what was the good of it to a non-stayer in such a race? There was no doubt how it would be. He would travel splendidly for six or seven furlongs; and then his bolt would be shot. Why, a common hunter would stand a better chance in the Cesarewitch than this showy, short-distance animal.

Such was the universal criticism. But Sir John, blinded by his infatuated superstition, never lost confidence to the last. His friends, who were standing near him, remarked the keen, excited look—the air of eager anticipation with which his face glowed as the flag fell to a fair start, and The Canon got well away. Most of them felt quite sorry for him—though he was far from popular even with his friends—when they thought of the inevitable disappointment in store for the eager, excited old man. It was only a matter of furlongs—a question of half-minutes—before The Canon would be out of it. Ah, there! He had already reached his distance; and that was a mile and a half from the finish. But, no. He was still going strong; no signs of flagging yet. Extraordinary, inexplicable! The mile was past, and The Canon was still in the race. But surely he must crack up in a few seconds! No! On and on! The devil! A mile and a half had been covered. The Canon still galloped as strong as any of them. Others began to flag—to fall out; but not The Canon. A mile and three quarters! Six were left in, and the Canon among them. Sir John's face was now stiff and tense as that of a statue; but his eyes burnt like coals in their hollow sockets. There was a dead silence along the whole course. Every eye was fixed on the light chestnut, who now held third place, and seemed full of running. Was Sir John a wizard? Had he bewitched his colt? Had Satan a finger in it? The distance! The Canon took second place.

Then a low murmur—a murmur of amazement—passed from lip to lip. The Canon was challenging the leading horse! For a hundred yards both ran neck-and-neck. Gameness alone kept them going. A loud shout went up. The Canon was the gamer. He forged ahead. The shout increased into a roar. The Canon had his opponent safe. He passed the judge's box a length in front. Sir John's face was a perfect blaze of triumph. He now spoke, for the first time since the start.

"By God! My dream—my presentiment! True! True! True!"

He staggered suddenly, and fell. The strain had been too much for him. They picked him up, with bloodless face and lips, in a dead faint.

* * * * *

Probably no horse's victory had ever quite so completely upset all calculations as that of The Canon in this Cesarewitch. And it is needless to say that it excited any amount of comment. People took different views. Some declared that the colt's reputation as a non-stayer had been artfully brought about by Sir John, in collusion with unscrupulous jockeys. But this, as all fair-minded men admitted, was an absurd contention. In the first place, the colt had more than once cracked up when ridden by jockeys who were above suspicion; and in the second, his failures had palpably been due to genuine want of stamina, and not to any "roping" or other unfair dodgery of that description. This view, therefore, could not be for a moment entertained. Others, the more superstitious, inclined to the belief that there was something miraculous in The Canon's victory, whether by the agency of God or devil. And the wiser, again, contented themselves with simply stating that Sir John was a very clever man, and that he had won a large sum over the race. But the means by which he had done it they frankly declared themselves unable even to conjecture.

It was not until many years later that the public learned the true explanation.

A country clergyman—incumbent of a parish on Salisbury Plain—was sent for late one night to the bedside of Sir John Kendric, who had been stricken with apoplexy, and whose life (so the doctor said) was now numbered by minutes. Almost with his last breath, the Baronet made the following remarkable confession:—

"Only the night before Sister Mary Martha's foal was born, I had a dream. I dreamed that—that she had foaled a colt with—with two heads; and that—that now one head seemed to vanish, now the other, and that then both would appear together; but only for an instant. The dream impressed me. I had always paid great attention to—to—dreams. And the—the—impression was strengthened when, next night, she—she—gave birth to twin foals. I—I—didn't know what I—I—meant to do. I had no fixed idea at that time; but—but—influenced by my dream, and—and—other inexplicable presentiments, I — I — suppressed the fact that twins had been foaled, and bribed the two other witnesses to hold their tongues. Then the dream and the presentiments began to explain themselves. The colts grew up as like as two peas. A vista of possibilities was opened to me; and when I found that one of the colts possessed exceptional stamina, while the other was entirely without it, I saw my way to—to—the fraud which I actually perpetrated. A week before the Cesarewitch I poisoned The Canon; and my man and I buried him in quicklime. This obliterated all evidence of my deception, and made discovery impossible. It—it—was The Canon's twin that won the race. I cannot die with this secret on my conscience. After I am dead, see that it is given to the world."

MUSIC.

THE NORWICH FESTIVAL.

THE Norwich Festival last week is, I am told, likely to figure out the most successful for many years. Royalty, of course, did something for it, and, indeed, there is not the slightest doubt that the audiences for the "Rose of Sharon" and "Fridolin" would hardly have been so large if the Prince of Wales, the Princess Louise, and the Duke and Duchess of York had not been present. St. Andrew's Hall, formerly the nave of a fifteenth-century monastery of the Black Friars, has 1,300 seats, and as the average attendance last week was about 1,150 per performance, there is nothing to complain about. The Tuesday night of the Norwich Festival is, however, always the worst in point of view of attendance, and it is worth considering whether it would not be better to utilise that evening for further rehearsals.

Nearly all our provincial festivals suffer from want of proper rehearsals, but, as at Norwich Signor Mancinelli occupied nearly all the only available day with the preparation of his new opera-cantata, Mr. Randegger—who rarely gets a rehearsal at all at Queen's Hall, and therefore anticipated a treat—was vainly expected to prepare six full-size programmes between eight and eleven o'clock on the Monday evening. The band, however, struck after thirteen hours' hard labour, and the choir agreed to come on the following day, thereby tiring themselves out before the festival began. Another day's rehearsal would not have cost much, but at too many provincial festivals the music is starved for the sake of the "charity."

The three novelties at Norwich were Signor Mancinelli's "Hero and Leander," Mr. Frederic Cliffe's violin concerto, and Professor Stanford's choral piece, "Phaudrig Crohoore." The last emphatically achieved the biggest success. This rollicking Hibernian version of "Young Lochinvar," with its bustle and excitement, its wedding jig, which set every foot a-going, and its dash of pathos which comes so effectively in the burden, "An' the Green Grass is Growin' o'er Phaudrig Crohoore," will, beyond doubt, run like wildfire through the choral societies of the provinces. Of Mr. Cliffe's clever new concerto the second movement is the best; but the rest sadly needs compression. M. Tividar Nachez, who played it, seemed to be very nervous, and his immensely long cadenza, based upon materials which had nothing to do with the work itself, should be sacrificed without mercy. The efforts of the Prince of Wales during the final movement to consult his watch without appearing to do so, were as amusing as the alacrity with which, at the last beat of the bâton, his Royal Highness bolted for his return train to Sandringham.

Mancinelli's "Hero and Leander" is a curious mixture of styles, that of Boïto and the modern Italians predominating. Some of it is immensely clever, the orchestration, much of it of extreme difficulty, being most interesting. The chief defect, of course, is the ridiculous length to which certain of the numbers are drawn out. Mme. Albani, for example, sang for full seventeen minutes by the clock, during the time Mr. Lloyd was supposed to be swimming across the Hellespont; while the subsequent finely written and often passionate, though apparently never ending, duet of the forgetful priestess and her damp lover occupied the rest of the evening. One of the baritone solos also seemed as long as an after-dinner speech by Sir A. C. Mackenzie. The gems of the work are the delicious "Sea Shell" solo, splendidly sung by Mme. Albani, the setting of two Anacreontic poems (one, of course, is not enough for Dr. Boïto, the librettist) sung by Mr. Lloyd, the sailors' chorus, the Boïto-like fugal chorus, and the address to Venus sung by Mr. Watkin Mills in the scene in which Hero takes the vows of virginity. Whether in these days, when opera-goers demand a plot of fire, life, and action, this idyllic tragedy will pass muster on the stage remains to be seen. The work will if possible be mounted at Covent Garden next summer, although the bold statement of an evening paper, whose critic apparently was doing his first festival, that the opera will be sung by the De Reszkes and Melba is an absurd fiction. The De Reszkes have nothing to do with it; and in default of Mme. Albani, the heroine is likely to fall to the lot of Mme. Eames.

The matters of Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, his London Conservatoire of Music, and the "Free Scholarship" swindle, to which I referred in TRUTH of September 24 and October 8 have brought me a good deal of further correspondence. Some writers indulge in vague, and therefore useless, generalities or in mere criticisms of a system of "voice production" with which I desire to have nothing whatever to do. A correspondent, however, encloses one of Mr. Cottell's circulars giving a picture of the "Conservatoire" in Porchester-road. My correspondent declares "it is as much like my house as his." It really is a most wonderful picture, if only from the point of view of perspective, for the trees in the far distance are ever so much bigger than those in the foreground. The sketch shows a huge mansion with a gigantic conservatory, terraces, and a broad carriage drive. A serving man has just opened, for the entrance of a barouche and pair, with coachman and footman, a double gate which apparently looks out upon a moor. I do not notice Royal Oak station, which is stated to adjoin this fine property; but on the noble lawn in the foreground a dozen ladies are strolling or playing tennis. Small wonder that "gentlemen's sons, just from school," compete for secretarial posts in this Adamless Eden. A professional musician of forty years' standing, however, writes:—

> Five or six of my pupils have been taken with the advertised bait of "free" scholarships, and in each case it has come to the same thing—every possible effort to secure fees in advance. Outside of these I know of one case where the parents of a young lady paid 50 guineas for a year's board and lodging and free tuition, and she left the conservatoire after six weeks' residence. To try the thing more directly, I sent a lady pupil (whose name I give you in confidence) in May last to the so-called Manchester Branch with careful instructions as to her line of conduct. This branch is simply a room where any one can teach or practice on the organ for 9d. or 1s. an hour. I teach the organ there myself. Mr. Cottell comes once or twice a fortnight for an hour or two to receive victims. My pupil went by appointment and came away with the enclosed.

The enclosure is a printed form headed "Resident and Free Scholarships," and with the wonderful picture of the Porchester-road "Conservatoire," to which I have already referred. The circular states, "Candidates are eligible on approval as above, and are entitled, by personal production of this form, duly filled up, to private interview and examination free of fees." At the back of the form are the pupil's name, and the printed words, "Free scholarships. Not transferable," while in Mr. Cottell's hand is written, "Lessons at Manchester £5. 5s. to Christmas. Free in London, or resident scholarship value 25 gs. off year's fees. June 2, 1896, director, Lansdowne Cottell." Mr. Cottell seems to have a peculiar idea of the term "Free" scholarships, and if the word "free" have any meaning at all, the charge proposed is neither more nor less than an extortion.

My correspondent continues, concerning the lady in question, "She was also informed that she could have a free scholarship at the Conservatoire on payment of 60 gs. for board and residence. She came away saying she would think of it." Mr. Cottell, however, was not the man to let the chance slip. A few weeks later came a letter, dated June 8, now before me, from the Secretary, stating that he would be obliged by this lady's decision "in reference to studies as approved by the Director." The lady apparently did not reply, and accordingly, on September 10, Mr. Lansdowne Cottell wrote himself. The letter is headed, "Executive Department, London Conservatoire of Music, Hyde Park, W.," and (the italics are Mr. Cottell's) it ran:—

> I have a vacancy, ladies' resident department, I can now offer you (if you promise 10 per cent. on engagements for three years) at 40 guineas, one payment premium for the year, and this includes board, residence, and musical training from three masters. We recommence Monday, the 4th inst.—Believe me, yours truly, LANSDOWNE COTTELL.

This, then, is Mr. Cottell's idea of "free" scholarships. One of my correspondents encloses me another circular of this London Conservatoire of Music, in which it is stated—

> Birmingham and Midland District Branch. At Messrs. Harrison's Music Warehouse, Colmore-row and Bennett's-hill. The Director receives intending students 3 to 6 p.m.

Mr. Percy Harrison, a gentleman well known in artistic and musical circles, may perhaps like to furnish some explanation. The list of professors given at the back of this precious circular comprises several well-known names, besides others with which I am unfamiliar. Mr. Lansdowne Cottell himself, however is principal and is also a professor of solo singing. Mr. Louis Cottell is a professor of solo singing, also of guitar playing, also of mandolin and banjo playing, also of the French language, and also of English and comedy opera. The family, therefore, seem to be many-sided and well represented.

M. Colonne, the renowned French conductor, made his long-promised English début at Queen's Hall on Monday. M. Colonne intended to come here last year to direct an English orchestra, but he wisely postponed his visit until now, when he brought over with him from Paris his famous band of the Association Artistique. This orchestra has been in existence upwards of twenty years, and it is chiefly celebrated for its rendering of Berlioz and other French composers. On Monday, apart from the "Reformation" symphony of Mendelssohn, by no means so well performed as at the Crystal Palace, the programme included a movement from Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy," besides selections from Massenet's "Hérodiade" and Berlioz's "Faust." The last was by far the best, and it must have been sheer perversity of management (the fault is, I believe, M. Colonne's) which placed it last in the programme to play the people out. The Dance of Sylphs, and the "King of Thule" ballad, sung by Mdlle. Prégi, a light soprano new to this country, have rarely or never been more beautifully rendered here.

The Promenade Concert season closed on Saturday, but the concerts will now be continued by Mr. Robert Newman weekly on Saturday nights only. Next Saturday we are promised for the first time a hitherto unknown suite by Tschaïkowski.

Mme. Nordica will, after all, not be a member of the Abbey and Grau opera troupe in New York this autumn. According to the American papers, she asked £200 a night for forty performances. I really do not see why she should not get it, save upon the managerial axiom that a prima donna is rarely a profit in her own country. The Americans, however, are very naturally inquiring whether the fact of her being a fellow-countrywoman should prevent her from sharing in the rapid rise of operatic fees in the States. Mme. Nordica, who is now filling some valuable engagements in the provinces, proposes to go to America in a few weeks for a concert tour.

One of the big things of the coming season will be the appearance of a choir from Leeds, with the Mottl orchestra, for a performance, under Herr Mottl, of Beethoven's Choral symphony. The Choral finale in the greatest of all symphonies is generally very badly done in the Metropolis. With the assistance of the Yorkshire chorus, Herr Mottl ought, however, to secure a model—in other words, a Mottl—performance.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—Niagara is to reopen for the winter skating on Monday next, Mr. Hwfa Williams having bought it. Sir William Call is to be manager. The whole place has been redecorated, and the restaurant will be open for dinners for the members of the club. There is to be skating on Sunday evenings as well as afternoons. We are going on the opening day, so I shall be able to describe it to you soon. The girls have been looking up their skates for it with great glee.

I have just seen a new and pretty gown at Oliver Holmes's. It was green cloth finished about the neck with wide bands of orange-russet velvet, and filled in with fulled black silk. This is a very new and pretty kind of bodice. The possibility of having any colour that suits one introduced in the silk at the neck enables one to wear a gown that would otherwise be very trying. Many rather sallow women delight in green, but cannot without injustice to themselves venture upon it without some such precaution.

Paris does not monopolise all dress cleverness. A perfectly sweet evening bodice shown us was designed by an English girl. And yet it breathed of Paris—that is, of smartness, modernity, and excellent finish. The little rucked bodice and gathered sleeves were in rose-pink crêpe de chine, the puffs of the latter being in the same material. But the bodice itself was almost hidden beneath a boléro of pink satin embroidered with black and silver sequins in a design of straying, wandering curves. A large knot of black satin ribbon held with a diamond button in the centre made a charming effect. Cream-coloured lace in a deep tone bordered the line of the boléro from the shoulders to the front. A group of mauve chrysanthemums on one shoulder, and tucked into the black satin belt at the side, completed a most covetable bodice. The skirt was plain pink satin.

A delicious dress for a young girl was in cream coloured silk barred with graduated lines of pale green velvet, the whole covered with a single veil of white spotted net (our old friend "point d'esprit" returned). A narrow tablier down the front had no veiling net and was bordered by lines of pale pink hawthorn. Knots of the light green velvet made a pretty finish down the centre. The bodice had a trellis of the narrowest velvet under a crossing piece of the point d'esprit with rows of velvet and bordered with a ruche of hawthorn. The sleeves were full frills of the spotted net over a tight sleeve with bands of green velvet. I wonder if I have made you "see" that sweet frock which some happy girl will wear at a dance, enjoying it all the more for the consciousness of looking well.

I did not forget that you want to know about smart winter coats, so asked to see the very latest and newest. One of these is made in palest grey caracul, fitting perfectly on the shoulders, but drawn in with some little fulness under a belt of pale grey cloth, sewn with silver. The revers are bright reddish mauve the tint of a scarcely ripe Orleans plum, and the space between them is filled in with a jabot of coffee-coloured lace. There is a very high and wide collar lined with the mauve velvet, and a short basque, rather full, but not fluted. The sleeves are modified "gigot," being full at the top and gradually growing narrow to the wrists. The belt is fastened with a handsome clasp, of amethyst and old silver, and smaller clasps on the revers serve to fold them across the chest when necessary.

Another very taking jacket is a Doucet model in black velvet, this being the very height of the fashion in Paris. The revers, like those of the grey caracul, reach to the waist, and are in chinchilla, with a jabot of creamy lace covering the interval between them. The bishop sleeves are finished at the wrists with fur, being caught in to the arms just above. The chinchilla can be turned back to form a cuff if liked, but in Paris the vogue is to wear them over the hand, which looks very small issuing from the thick fur.

Are you not glad that cashmere is in again? No other material falls in such inimitable folds. I was pleased to see a gown made of it, in the soft, double warp kind, among those just brought from Paris by Mme. Oliver Holmes. It was in heliotrope, and had the usual plain skirt. The bodice had a full front formed of one end of a white crêpe de chine scarf embroidered in a curious horizontal stitch in coloured flowers of arrasene. The rest of this scarf hung down at the left side over the skirt. The fronts of the bodice were edged with skunk, and touches of bright lilac velvet appeared at the neck and wrists. This lilac was not in a friendly tone with the heliotrope, but though it jarred a little it was an item that gave a suggestion of Paris to the gown.

"The ideal of what an English lady's dress ought to be—neat, sartorially faultless, with a grace of style all its own."—Extract from The Daily Telegraph, July 2nd, 1896, referring to a riding habit made by J. Busvine & Co., 4, Brook-street, W.

I am sending you patterns of Liberty's cashmeres, as you asked me to do. Are they not agreeably soft? And some of the mignonette shades are sweetly pretty. I have rather fallen in love with the nut-brown, No. 1,210. The Melrose cloths would be put down as hop-sack by the ordinary individual. There is a nice feuille morte among them. The Khush cloths are of the tufted order, with a camel-hair finish. There is a deep green that would make a jolly winter costume trimmed with skunk. In the same book of samples are wool crêpes in bright, light tints, suitable for evening dress. With disgraceful perverseness I have selected a sweet mouse colour as the prettiest among them. I can fancy it looking delicious with a lining of coral-pink poplin, vest and belt of the same, with braces of coral-pink ribbons, and revers of the same over velvet sleeves in the same bright colour. Dash in a little creamy lace, and there you have the gown of my heart!

Liberty's English silks and brocades are very tempting. Note the chené effects in the "Otley" and their soft, sweet tints. The "Ulrome" are in more decisive colours, such as turquoise, coral, applegreen, reddish mauve, and Chinese yellow. The "Thalia" brocades are capital for draping, and consequently suit the tea-gown very well.

I saw on a board near a certain church the other day the name of a club that struck me as being extraordinarily irreverent. This was it: "Holy Trinity Athletic Club." What do you think of it?

A nation of shopkeepers! The indictment appears to be a true one when even women of high rank descend to make money out of bicycling firms in the manner recently reported. One lady, unwilling to pay a high price, suggested that her riding a particular make of cycle would render it fashionable, and the firm, falling in with the idea, presented it to her. Another, finding that her friends accepted her recommendation to buy a similar machine to that she rode, bethought her to turn this into a matter of commerce, asking and securing from the makers a commission of 15 per cent. on all purchases influenced by her.

Nothing wrong in this, of course, but, somehow, it does not fit in with one's ideal of a true gentlewoman. Do you think it does? I am afraid the standard is gradually lowering. Curious examples are set in very high places, however, so that it is not, perhaps, surprising that the whole lump is leavened, right away down, as our Western cousins might express it.

Richard's sister, Helen, who lives in a sweet little place in Berkshire, having taken it for the usual "seven, fourteen, or twenty-one," has just had bicycle stables rigged up by Humphreys, of corrugated iron fame. We spent a couple of days there this week, and noticed that some of the wheel people were as careful about their steeds as though they had been made of flesh and blood. Most of them seemed to be particularly on their guard against the risk of their bicycles being ridden by others, or interfered with in any way. The cases were locked up each time we went in. And no wonder! Helen's friend, Mrs. Dunne-Browne, discovered that during her absence on the Continent her pretty parlourmaid had not only been wearing her gowns, but riding her bike all over the country. The most annoying part of this is that the girl is not very much unlike the mistress, being of the same height, rather similar colouring, and resembling her also in outline. Consequently, it is more than likely that some of her doings—which may possibly have been of the free and easy sort—may be ascribed to her employer. What complications may not ensue!

Scandal is such a rapid grower, you know. Jack's beanstalk was nothing to it. Our vicar, last Sunday, told us that men are worse sinners in this respect than women, and ascribed the frequency of such occurrences to the absence of duelling in this country. It is very certain that the law is a slow and cumbersome method of righting wrongs that one burns to adjust without delay. Every moment that one rests under a false suspicion seems a small eternity.

I saw that Mr. Commissioner Kerr, during a recent case, actually uttered from the Bench an opinion that it would have been well if a certain young woman had had a brother who would have used a thick stick on her behalf, applying it to some cowardly miscreant who had in some way injured her.

Would you like to know the size of the hat worn by Miss Kate James while singing a song called "The Matinée Hat," in "Lord Tom Noddy," at the Garrick Theatre? The crown is 10 in. high, the diameter 33½ in., and the circumference 3 yds. As it is white, and the trimmings are immensely high, you may imagine that the hat gives considerable point to the song.

Every woman in the Comedy Theatre wanted a cape like Miss Lottie Venne's in "Mr. Martin." It is a delicious little thing in mauve velvet lined with apple-green satin, and made with a high collar and stole ends of skunk. And her green cloth costume in the last act is also adapted to give rise to covetous sentiments. The seams are sewn with black, and the short coat is quite straight back and front, the latter being ornamented with oblong tabs in black, with a narrow white line round them. The high collar is lined with chinchilla. When "the glittering Star of Erin" takes this off she reveals a sweet little bodice cut away at the neck to show a double ruffle of pink silk made in chemisette style. The bodice is bordered round the shoulders with bands of black velvet edged with white, these bands not being put on in a straight line, but crossing each other obliquely in a new and pretty way. The rest is green cloth, and the sleeves are slashed with green velvet. Miss Isabel Bateman looked very pretty in a white dinner frock with a white chiffon ruffle round her neck, and in the first piece, "A White Stocking," Miss Elliott Page, proved what needs no proof, viz., how very becoming was dress in the Vicar of Wakefield days. The effect of a narrow band of coral-red velvet round her neck, and matching that with which her hair was tied, was very good.

Miss Rose Leclercq's Irish brogue seemed to cause herself so much amusement that she could not keep a grave face in the midst of all her scheming. But she should not say, "Ahr now!" The pleading, beguiling, coaxing, entreating of the Irish "Ah-h now" has the vowel long-drawn and very flat. But the rest of her brogue is lovely.

Have you seen any of the fine engravings in the "Book of Beauty," just published by Hutchinson & Co.? It is a quarto volume, bound in white and gold, and contains eighty or ninety portraits of some of the loveliest women in England. The book is edited by Mrs. F. Harcourt Williamson, and contains contributions in prose and verse from some of the originals themselves, their friends, and their admirers. The book is limited to four hundred copies, a few being sold at six guineas and the rest at five. The engravings are of such a costly character that the price must necessarily be high. The "beauties" start with the Princess of Wales, and there is a pleasant portrait of the Duchess of Fife and her two little girls. Those of the Duchess of Portland, Lady Powis, Lady Yarborough, and others are copies of Ellis Roberts', and have quite the Gainsborough look. Lady Deerhurst has the unique distinction of being praised by her mother-in-law in a few felicitous lines.

The sequence of the portraits has been carefully arranged, so that relatives are, so far as possible, grouped together. Lady Hood's portraits of her children face her own charming likeness on the opposite page. In the same way Lady Granby's counterfeit presentment is close to her sketch of her little girl. Lady Rose Leigh and Lady Dangan are together.

Is it invidious to select three or four that struck me as being the loveliest faces in the book? No, I think not, for I can leave it vague as to whether the superiority of beauty belongs to the originals or to the artists' skill. Well, then, I may place first Lady Helen Vincent, Georgina Lady Dudley, Lady Worcester, Lady De Trafford, Lady Naylor-Leyland, and Lady Eden. Whistler's portrait of Lady Archibald Campbell is included, and there are examples of Leighton, Millais, Sargent, Constant, Duran, Watts, Richmond, and Shannon reproduced in the finest photogravure, or printed on Japanese paper in proof and mounted on separate pages.

There are three boys represented in the "Book of Beauty"—little Lord Parker, and the youthful Anthony de Rothschild and Hugh Northcote. There are several children, and you would be delighted with the softness of the tinting in many of these. There is no real black, no staring white, only tones of cream and brown being included.

Just one recipe. Partridges larded and braised with celery sauce are a pleasant change:—

Take 3 birds for a dish, truss them into shape, and lard the breast with strips of fat bacon; put them into a stewpan with the trimmings of bacon, a little rough celery, an onion, a bouquet of herbs, about 6 peppercorns, 2 cloves, a blade of mace, and a little white stock, which must not touch the larding. Cover the birds with a buttered paper, replace the lid of the stewpan, and bring them to the boil on the fire; then place the stewpan in the oven to simmer for an hour and a half. Meanwhile, wash and shred 4 or 5 sticks of celery, blanch them in boiling water for ten minutes; strain, and put the celery into a stewpan with a piece of butter, a little salt, and the juice of half a lemon, cover closely and cook the celery on the side of the stove until tender, then rub it through the tammy or hair sieve. When the birds are done, remove them from the braise, glaze the larding, and keep them warm in the oven. Strain the braise into a basin, remove the grease, and thicken it with a piece of butter, kneaded with a tablespoonful of flour; stir it till it boils, squeeze through the tammy and return it to the stewpan to warm, adding the purée of celery, a gill of cream and salt and pepper to taste. Glaze the birds again, place them on a dish, with a large croûton of fried bread, cut in the shape of a cockscomb, between each, and pour the purée round.

Ever dear, your loving cousin, MADGE.

SIR GEORGE TRESSADY

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD,

Author of "Robert Elsmere," "The History of David Grieve," "Marcella," &c.

From the Westminster Gazette:—"Mrs. Humphry Ward's latest novel is in many respects the best work that she has written. From first to last it is a novel of striking power, written with remarkable insight, delicacy, and restraint, and handled, especially in the opening and closing chapters, with a touch that only great artists of literature possess."

In 2 vols. with 2 Portraits and 2 Maps, demy 8vo, 28s.

THE MEMOIRS OF BARON THIÉBAULT.

(LATE LIEUTENANT-GENERAL IN THE FRENCH ARMY). With Recollections of the Republic, the Consulate, and the Empire. Translated and condensed by A. J. Butler, M.A., Translator of the "Memoirs of Marbot."

From the Daily Chronicle: "These memoirs will take high rank among the literature of the period of which they treat. There is not an uninteresting page in them. Mr. Butler's work as translator and editor is performed with the judicious care for which he has already won a reputation, and he has provided a treat for the general reader and the historical student alike."

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

HOW TO MAKE AN INCOME-PAYING HOME.

The object of the above Company is to develop the resources of their estate, consisting of about 12,000 acres, situated in the far-famed Tulbagh district in the Western Province of Cape Colony, about 75 miles distant by rail from Cape Town. They are promoting the establishment of a successful colony. The estate has been surveyed and laid out in blocks of about 40 acres each, a number of which have already been sold. The purchase price of this land this year (with all water facilities) is £12 per acre, threequarters of which can remain bearing interest at six per cent. per annum.

In order to provide for the success of every colonist who has sufficient capital at command to be able to enter into this business, but has no practical knowledge of the work, the company have engaged the services of an efficient manager and a skilled horticulturist; and who will, if desired, plant, cultivate, and attend to the development of each client's farm for one year or more.

Thus any settler, provided he gives ordinary attention to the details of the work this company have undertaken for him, can obtain, under the guidance of a skilled specialist, that practical knowledge which is essential in the working to the best advantage of dairy and fruit farms.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

The Company undertake, if desired, to clear, plant, fence, supervise, and generally manage any holding. They guarantee that 90 per cent. of the trees and vines planted under the supervision of their staff grow to maturity, as specified in the agreement, a copy of which can be obtained on application. The company will manage the estate of any absentee at a charge of £1 a year per acre, and will also undertake to erect on the estate any houses for the residence of a settler, which can be chosen in London before sailing, with estimates given. They further undertake to purchase from a settler, at marketable prices, any approved dairy, farm, and orchard produce.

At the company's headquarters, at Seven Fountains, are the orchard and vineyard belonging to the company, and extensive creameries, packing houses, &c., will be erected as soon as necessary.

Steps are already being taken for the erection of a sugar beet factory, &c., and it is the intention of the company to promote milling and other industries.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

The Company solicit enquiries from families who are seeking a fresh start in life.

Young gentlemen who are looking for an opening in which to make their way.

Farmers who for years have been losing money in this country and would like to start afresh.

Retired members of the Military, Naval, and Civil Services, desiring to increase their incomes.

The delicate (those inclined to bronchial and pulmonary troubles) who need an avenue for making an income in a congenial climate.

The General Manager of the Company is going out at the beginning of October, and will be pleased to have the Company of any one who desires to avail himself of this opportunity of a fresh start in life in a new field.

All are requested to be good enough to place themselves in communication with the Secretary of the Company—

from whom full particulars and papers on all points can be obtained. Also the illustrated book on the subject, price 2s., together with a Manual of Practical Orchard Work at the Cape. Published by the Department of Agriculture of the Cape of Good Hope.

DISTILLED FROM FRESHLY GATHERED RHINE VIOLETS.

A SCENT OF RARE FRAGRANCE.

A VERY ECHO OF NATURE.

CAUTION.

Owing to the phenomenal success of this popular Scent, some perfumers are offering essences of their own manufacture under the name of "RHINE VIOLETS." The public must not be deceived, but insist upon "MULHENS'" brand, which is distilled from the flower itself. Don't accept any bottle not bearing Ferd. Mülhens' name. This alone ensures genuineness. Ferd. Mülhens, of Cologne, is the originator of this exquisite perfume, and was the first to introduce it into England.

The Fashionable Press of London are unanimous in praise of it.

STOCK CONVERSION AND INVESTMENT TRUST, LIMITED (LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN DEFERRED CHARGE STOCK).—Attention is drawn to the above Stock, which is quoted on the London and leading provincial Stock Exchanges. It receives for each year ending June 30th all dividends paid in excess of 5% on an equal amount of London and North-Western Railway Ordinary Stock. Its last dividend was at the rate of One Pound Five Shillings Per Cent., which at the present price of the Stock—viz., 29 per cent.—YIELDS A RETURN OF FOUR POUNDS SIX SHILLINGS PER CENT., and EACH ADDITIONAL FIVE SHILLINGS PER CENT. PAID ON LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN ORDINARY STOCK WILL INCREASE THIS RETURN BY SEVENTEEN SHILLINGS PER CENT.

The London and North-Western Railway traffic has increased by over £100,000 during the past 12 weeks, and there is thus every reason to anticipate an increasing dividend. No Home Railway Security yields so good an income return. The register of this Stock is kept by the National Provincial Bank of England, Limited.

Subscribers will receive interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the respective due dates of the Instalments to 1st March, 1897, by Interest Scrip payable on the latter date, to be delivered with the Debentures.

The First undetached Coupon, for Six Months' Interest, will be payable on 1st September, 1897.

Messrs. Coates, Son, & Co. are authorised by the Corporation of the City of St. Catherines to receive subscriptions for the above general Consolidated Loan Debentures, and the Subscription Lists will be opened at their Offices, 99, Gresham-street, London, E.C., on Tuesday, 13th October, 1896, and closed at or before Four o'clock on Thursday, 15th October, 1896.

These Debentures are issued under authority and by virtue of an Act of the Legislature of Ontario, 56 Vict., cap. 79, entitled "An Act to consolidate the debt of the City of St. Catherines," and by authority of Bye-Law No. 1,019 of the City Council, duly passed, to provide funds for the sole purpose of redeeming and consolidating maturing bonds and discharging other indebtedness of the City on which a higher rate of interest is now being paid.

The above Act and Bye-Law provide that a special rate shall be levied in each year on all the rateable property of the City, in addition to all other rates, sufficient to pay the interest on these Debentures and to create a sinking fund for their repayment at maturity.

The City of St. Catherines, Province of Ontario, is situated in the Niagara Peninsula on the Welland Canal, which connects Lake Erie with Lake Ontario. It is the centre of the fruit producing district of Canada, possesses abundant water power, and is the seat of numerous industrial establishments, such as Flour Mills, Fruit Canning Factories, Saw and Axe Factories, Foundries, Planing Mills, Tanneries, Woollen Mills, Breweries, &c. It is lighted by gas and electricity, has good sewerage, and is supplied with good water by an effective system of gravitation.

The Bonded Debt of the City was by the above-mentioned Act consolidated at $790,000, and the Corporation has power under this Act to issue Debentures up to this amount. The present debt of the City is stated by the Treasurer to amount to $769,393·67 cents, and will not be increased by the present issue.

The total amount of rateable property according to the last revised Assessment Roll for 1896, amounts to $4,231,915.

The Revenue for the year 1895 was $121,595·97 cents.

The annual amount required to provide for Interest and Sinking Fund on the present issue is $21,937·58 cents.

The City is possessed of assets of about equal value to its total liabilities, consisting of Waterworks, Gas Stocks, School Buildings and Lands, Municipal Buildings and Court House, Fire Department, Parks, &c., some of which are of income yielding character.

The Waterworks system has cost to date $381,468·18 cents, upon which outlay the City now receives an annual revenue of 6 per cent.

The following Certificate has been furnished by Messrs. Bruce, Burton, & Bruce, Barristers, of Hamilton, Ontario :—

"Hamilton, Ontario,
"30th July, 1896.

"Messrs. Coates, Son, & Co.,
"99, Gresham-street, London, England.

"Dear Sirs,—We have examined Bye-Law No. 1,019, passed by the City of St. Catherines, on the 22nd day of June, 1896, authorising the issue of Debentures to the amount of $369,500, payable on the 1st day of September, 1926, with Interest thereon at the rate of Four per Centum per annum, payable half-yearly on the first days of March and September.

"This Bye-Law was passed under the provisions of an Act of the Legislature of Ontario, 56 Victoria, Chapter 79, and is in accordance with the special provisions of that Act. In our opinion it is a good and valid Bye-Law and you may safely issue the Debentures authorised thereunder. The Debentures are 759 for £100 Sterling each and one for £24. 12s. Sterling, and together with the Coupons, are payable at the Bank of Montreal, London, England.

"Yours truly,
(Signed) "A. BRUCE,
For BRUCE, BURTON, & BRUCE."

The Statements in this prospectus respecting the City and its finances are based upon information supplied by the City Treasurer.

Applications on the form issued with the prospectus, must be accompanied by a deposit of £5 per cent. on the amount of Debentures applied for, and be forwarded to Messrs. Coates, Son, & Co., 99, Gresham-street, London, E.C.

If no allotment is made the deposit will be returned without deduction, and if a partial allotment is made the surplus deposit will be applied towards the amount payable on allotment. In case of default in the payment of any instalment at its due date, all amounts previously paid will be liable to forfeiture. The instalments due on the 12th November and 15th December, may be paid on or after allotment, under discount at the rate of £2 per cent. per annum.

Application will be made in due course for a quotation for the Debentures upon the London Stock Exchange.

Copies of the Act of the Ontario Legislature and of the Bye-Law of the City of St. Catherines, authorising the issue of the Debentures, can be inspected at the Offices of Messrs. Wilson, Bristows, & Carpmael, Solicitors, 1, Copthall-buildings, London, E.C.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed to acquire and work two Gold Mining Properties, the one known as "Peabody," having an extent of about 50 acres, and the other the northern half of "Berkshire," about 15 acres, adjoining, with all rights, claims, mill site, and water rights

The properties are advantageously situated, being within about 2½ miles of a railway station, and 200 miles from Melbourne, and according to the reports there is an ample supply of water and timber for all milling and mining operations.

The mines have been worked in a primitive way, but with the capital now to be provided, a mill can be erected, and a low level tunnel driven, which will intersect all the reefs about 150 ft. below the present workings, and do away with the sleighing and cartage of the ore to the custom mill, which is now necessary.

The "Peabody" Mine has been thoroughly well proved, having been worked on a small scale since 1861. For ten years, up to November, 1893, it was in the hands of two working miners, Messrs. Peter and Thomas Robertson (father and son). During the time they were the owners they took out gold to the value of over £10,000. Six reefs have already been cut and partially worked upon, the following being returns from some small crushings of ore made by Messrs. Robertson :—

674 tons yielded 1,414 oz. gold.
Some of the ore milled 4½ oz. gold per ton.

Since 1893 a considerable amount of work has been done, a tunnel having been driven 637 ft., which has cut the reefs worked in the upper levels. In the course of development small quantities of ore have been collected, and nine crushings made, in all about 445 tons, which yielded 726 oz. of gold, and realised over £4 per oz., the last crushing showing about 2 oz. to the ton.

Work has only been done on a very small part of the Company's property; the northern portion has not yet been touched, with the exception of slight surface workings.

It is believed that the reefs already found on the "Peabody" will run into the "Berkshire," which gives the properties an additional value, especially as they can be conveniently worked together. The new tunnel can be made in such a way that the mines will be drained, and the trucks run direct to the mill site, where it is proposed to erect a battery. All crushings in the past have been at a custom's mill, and the late owners are of opinion that a considerable percentage of the gold has been lost in treatment. The district is noted for the large output of gold in the past. The "Oriental" claim, which is situated next to the southern half of the "Berkshire," is said to have contained a reef 30 ft. to 40 ft. wide, and produced gold to the value of £750,000, to a depth of 200 ft. This line of reef enters the "Berkshire" property, and some of the ore taken has yielded as high as 5 oz. of gold per ton.

Mr. J. Macdonald Cameron, F.G.S., F.C.S., formerly Member of Parliament for the Northern Burghs, and now Deputy Master Sydney Branch of the Royal Mint, has made a most exhaustive report.

The properties have also been reported upon by Mr. T. G. Davey, F.G.S., &c., Mr. R. H. Rowe, Mining Engineer, and Mr. H. P. Richards, Mine Manager. Extracts from these reports are contained in the full prospectus.

Mr. R. H. Rowe, Mining Engineer, says in his report—

"I have been connected with quartz mining in the Australian Colonies over forty years, and since 1871 have been a mining manager. The opinion I have given on the 'Peabody' is not a scientific one, but that of a practical miner who is well acquainted with the characteristics of the quartz reefs in this district, having been mining here many years, and in my opinion the Peabody Mine will prove to be one of the best mining properties in this proverbially mining centre, and have very great pleasure in recommending it to investors."

The reports have been made for the Peabody Gold Mining Corporation, Limited, the former owners of the "Peabody" portion of the property, and the statements herein are based upon the said reports.

The purchase price of the properties has been fixed at £85,000, payable as to £55,000 in fully paid-up Shares of the Company, and the balance in cash or shares at the option of the Directors, leaving available 15,000 Shares to provide working capital, of which 10,000 Shares will now be issued, and 5,000 Shares held in reserve, as recommended in the reports.

The Mines Contract Company, Limited, are the Vendors and the Promoters of the Company, and will pay all expenses of and incidental to the formation of the Company up to and including the first general Allotment.

For particulars of Contracts, &c., see full Prospectus.

The Agreement and Memorandum and Articles of Association can be inspected at the Offices of the Solicitors to the Company, and the reports, maps, plans, &c., may be seen on application at the Offices of the Company.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained from the Bankers and Solicitors, and of the Secretary, at the Offices of the Company.

This Company was formed for the purpose of amalgamating, acquiring, and taking over as going concerns as on the 30th day of September, 1896, the assets, undertakings, and properties of the following amongst other Companies :—

The Golden Link Gold Mining Company, Limited,
The Eclipse Gold Mining Company, Limited, and The Hesperus Gold Mining Company, Limited.

The properties owned by these Companies comprise 95 acres, situated in the heart of the Hannan's District in Western Australia, and the two extreme properties are within twelve minutes' cycle distance of each other.

The Capital of the Company has been fixed at £550,000, with a view to the subsequent amalgamation and absorption of one or more other Companies in addition to the three above-mentioned (for the purchase of whose undertakings £238,227 only will be required), and to provide this Company with a further substantial sum for Working Capital.

The object of the Directors is to secure unity of management, and to effect a material reduction of working expenses, the saving which will be obtained by the amalgamation of the above three Companies in Directors', Auditors', and Consulting Engineer's fees, Secretarial and office expenses, being a very substantial sum estimated at some thousands of pounds per annum. In addition it is desired that the Shareholders should feel that this Company is being managed in their interests by a body of business men in whom they have full confidence; and, accordingly, it is provided in the Articles of Association of the Company that the Directors above-named shall only hold office until the statutory meeting of the Company unless confirmed in their office thereat.

In addition to the mining properties before referred to, the new Company will acquire from the above Companies, on the completion of the purchases with them, upwards of £50,000 in cash and about £8,000 worth of machinery already in Australia, besides other valuable assets.

The consideration to be given by this Company to the old Companies will be satisfied by the issue of 238,227 fully-paid Shares in this Company in place of 251,410, the present issued Share Capital of the old Companies.

Owing to the fact that a part of the assets of the Golden Link Company consists of a considerable number of Shares in the Hesperus Company, which Shares will become the property of this Company, so that it will not be necessary to issue any Shares in this Company in respect thereof, and owing to other arrangements which have been made by the Shareholders of the Eclipse Company amongst themselves, the following table shows the exact effect and operation of the amalgamation already carried out :—

	Present issued Capital.	Shares issued by New Company as purchase-money.
Golden Link Company ...	£90,000 ...	£112,500
Eclipse Company	80,320 ...	76,000
Hesperus Company	81,090 ...	49,727
	£251,410	£238,227

The immediate result of the amalgamation has been therefore, as is shown by these figures, a reduction of £13,183 in the issued capital of the Company upon which dividends will be payable.

Among the contracts entered into before the registration of this Company were four, all of which are dated the 24th day of September, 1896, and are made with William Cooper, as trustee for and on behalf of this Company, by the Golden Link Gold Mining Company, Limited, the Eclipse Gold Mining Company, Limited, the Hesperus Gold Mining Company, Limited, and Scott Lings, respectively, and since the registration of the Company these contracts have been adopted by it, and the bulk of the assets in England of those three Companies have been handed over to this Company.

The Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company can be inspected at the office of the Company at any time during business hours during the week ending the 17th October, 1896.

The Company having gone to Allotment, and no Shares being offered for Public Subscription, this Notice is only intended for the purpose of giving Public Information.

The Prospectus is being issued simultaneously in England and France.

The Subscription List is NOW OPEN, and will CLOSE TO-DAY, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 14th, 1896, for London and Country, and on or before SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17th, for France.

PROSPECTUS.

OBJECTS.—This Company has been formed for the purpose of amalgamating, carrying on, and developing the well-known and flourishing French Cycle businesses as under:—

(1) La Société des Vélocipèdes Clément.
(2) La Société Française des Cycles Gladiator.
(3) The French business of Humber & Company, Limited.

The important amalgamation constituted by the union of these three great Companies will, it is believed, form one of the largest Cycle monopolies in Europe, and give to this Company an unequalled position in the Cycle industry of France.

PROFITS.—The turnover of the three Companies—La Société des Vélocipèdes Clément for the 19 months ending September 30th, 1895; La Société Française des Cycles Gladiator for the 18 months ending September 30th, 1895; and the French business of Humber & Co., Limited, for the two years ending August 31st, 1895—amounted to the sum of £602,807, whilst the profits for the same period of the two first mentioned Companies alone amounted to £87,001 3s. 6d.

The profits of the two Companies, La Société des Vélocipèdes Clément and La Société Française des Cycles Gladiator, for the year ending the 1st of October, 1896, are guaranteed by the Vendor to this Company at £80,000.

The results of the French business of Humber & Co., Limited, for the current year have not yet been ascertained, but judging from the turnover and the popularity of Humber Machines in France, the profits should be very considerable.

The profits of La Société des Vélocipèdes Clément and La Société Française des Cycles Gladiator, as guaranteed for the past year, were made without the aid of any of the advantages which must accrue from this amalgamation; and the following figures, based upon the Capital of this Company, are therefore eminently satisfactory:—

£200,000 Preference, 6 per Cent.	£12,000
700,000 Ordinary, 9 per Cent.	63,000
	£75,000

This calculation is made without taking into account any profits of the French business of Humber & Co., Ltd., which should materially increase the Dividend on the Ordinary Shares.

WORKING CAPITAL.—The operations of this Company will be of so extensive a character that a large Working Capital is, in the opinion of the Directors, essential. They have accordingly made arrangements which (with the accrued profits and reserve fund) will place at their disposal the ample sum of £150,000.

IMPORT DUTY.—A most important factor in estimating the future prospects of this Company is the question of import duty. This matter is now under the consideration of the authorities, and it is generally anticipated in France that the present duty on cycles will be largely increased. Any increase would materially bear upon the profits on French-made machines, and enhance the earnings of this Company by greatly reducing foreign competition.

MOTOR CARS.—A great feature for the immediate future is the new industry of Motor Carriages and Cycles. In the opinion of the Directors too much importance cannot be attached to this new industry, which at present is far more advanced and popular in France than any other country; and in order to fully develop this branch of the business extensive works will be erected at Levallois Perret.

Monsieur Clément was among the first to realise the great prospective value of this branch of the trade, and has at the present moment more orders in hand than he can execute.

The following is a short description of the businesses taken over:—

(1) LA SOCIETE DES VELOCIPEDES CLEMENT.

This business was established in 1875 by Monsieur Clément, who was practically the pioneer of Cycling in France, and to this gentleman was due the introduction of Dunlop Pneumatic Tyres into France, thereby giving a fresh impetus to an already important industry.

The business steadily increased, and in March, 1894, was formed into a Company constituted according to French Law under the style of La Société des Vélocipèdes Clément, and from that time has developed to such an extent that it is now unquestionably one of the foremost in France.

Monsieur Clément (the founder) has received at the hands of the French Government the high distinction of being the first cycle manufacturer to be decorated with the Legion d'Honneur, and the name of "Clément" in connection with cycles is known throughout France as "La Grande Marque Nationale."

This business is taken over from 1st of October, 1895, so that this Company will obtain the full benefit of a year's trading with profits estimated by La Société des Vélocipèdes Clément and guaranteed by the Vendor to this Company to amount to at least £40,000.

The works are situated in the Rue Brunel, Paris, and at Tulle (Corrèze), and are equipped with all the most modern machinery and plant sufficient to turn out at least twenty-five thousand machines yearly. The plant, machinery, and tools have been valued by Monsieur C. Bourdon, the well-known engineer of Paris, at £40,348 15s. 8d. The leasehold premises and buildings have been valued by Monsieur P. Collin, the well-known Architect of Paris, at £5,760.

Branch Depôts have been established at Madrid and Geneva, where a large and increasing business is in progress.

Agencies have also been established for the sale of Clément Cycles in every principal town in France, and also at St. Petersburg, Copenhagen, Milan, Athens, Brussels, Bucharest, Amsterdam, Lisbon, Buenos Ayres, Santiago, Constantine, Algiers, Sfax, Tunis, Alexandria, Saigon, Hong Kong, Port Said, and throughout the whole of South America.

The extremely valuable services of Monsieur Clément have been retained for the new Company, so that the organisation, which has hitherto been so successful, will be continued without interruption.

(2) LA SOCIETE FRANCAISE DES CYCLES GLADIATOR.

This business was established in 1891 by Messieurs Aucoc and Darracq at Pré-St.-Gervais, near Paris; and in 1894, owing to the extension of their trade, a Company was formed under the style of La Société Française des Cycles Gladiator.

The success of this Company has been phenomenal, as since its formation in 1894 its business has developed enormously, and earned a reputation unsurpassed in the trade.

Much of the credit for the excellence of workmanship and design for which "Gladiator" Machines are so justly noted is due to Monsieur Darracq, whose services have been retained on the Board of the new Company.

This business is taken over as from 1st October, 1895, with guaranteed profits of £40,000.

The plant, machinery, and tools have been valued by Monsieur C. Bourdon at £20,479. 12s., and the buildings and land by Monsieur P. Collin at £12,855. 12s.

The works where the famous "Gladiator" machines are manufactured are situate at Pré-St.-Gervais, Paris, and are equipped with the most modern machinery and plant necessary for turning out at least 25,000 machines each year.

This Company has also an extensive factory at Nantes capable of turning out 6,000 or 7,000 machines each year. These cycles have obtained a great reputation under the name of "Phebus."

This Company is recognised in France as well as in England as the pioneer of the quadruplettes and quintuplettes so extensively used on racing tracks.

Gladiator Cycles are now well-known in England, an Agency having been established in Oxford-street, London; and this year the much-coveted distinction of being the first to ride 30 miles in the hour was earned by Mr. Tom Linton on a Gladiator machine.

(3) HUMBER & COMPANY, LIMITED.

This Business has been established in France for several years, where, as in England, Humber Cycles have obtained a reputation second to none, and their sales by far exceed those of any other English manufacturer.

The Humber Head Depôt is one of the finest in Paris, and is situated at 19, Rue du Quatre Septembre, one of the busiest thoroughfares of the city.

Agencies for Humber Cycles have been established in the suburbs of Paris and in every important town in the Country.

The purchase price to be paid by this Company is £900,000, out of which the Promoter will provide a sum which (with the profits already accrued and reserve fund) will leave the Company a working capital of £150,000.

The Vendor will pay all expenses of every kind up to and including the completion of the purchase.

A London Stock Exchange settlement and quotation will be applied for in due course.

The Contracts entered into are as follows:—

1. Agreement dated the 11th day of July, 1896, and made between La Société Française des Cycles Gladiator of the one part, and Ernest Terah Hooley of the other part.
2. Supplemental Agreement to above dated 17th day of July, 1896, made between the same parties; and also an extract from the Minutes of the General Meeting of the said Société dated the 18th day of July, 1896.
3. Agreement dated the 8th day of August, 1896, and made between La Société des Vélocipèdes Clément of the one part, and Ernest Terah Hooley of the other part; and also an extract from the Minutes of the General Meeting of the said Société dated the same day.
4. Agreement dated the 6th day of October, 1896, and made between Humber & Company (Extension), Limited, of the first part; Humber & Company, Limited, of the second part; and the said Ernest Terah Hooley of the third part.
5. Agreement dated the 5th day of October, 1896, and made between the said Ernest Terah Hooley, as Proprietor of La Société des Vélocipèdes Clément, and The Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company (France), Limited.
6. Agreement dated the 8th day of August, 1896, and made between the said Ernest Terah Hooley, as Proprietor of La Société Française des Cycles Gladiator, and the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company (France), Limited.
7. Agreement dated the 7th day of October, 1896, and made between Ernest Terah Hooley of the one part, and Robert Doncaster, Trustee for and on behalf of this Company, of the other part.

The businesses will be taken over subject to all existing contracts. These are of the ordinary trade character, and necessary for the working of the concerns, but, including as they do contracts with employees and customers and others, they cannot be specified.

There may be also other contracts relating to the formation of the Company, and subscriptions to the capital and otherwise, which may technically fall within Section 38 of the Companies Acts, 1867. Subscribers will be held to have had notice of all these contracts, and to have waived all right to be supplied with particulars of such contracts, and to have agreed with the Company as Trustee for the Directors and other persons liable not to make any claim whatsoever, or to take any proceedings under the said section in respect of any non-compliance therewith.

Applications for Shares should be made on the forms enclosed, and forwarded to the Bankers of the Company, with the amount of the deposit.

If no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full, and where the number of Shares allotted is less than the number applied for, the balance will be applied towards payment due on allotment, and any excess will be returned to the applicant.

Copies of the Prospectus, with Forms of Application for Shares, can be obtained at the Offices of the Company, or from their Bankers, Brokers, or Solicitors.

Shylock: Fair sir, you spit on me on Wednesday last, "The Merchant of Venice," act i, sc. 1, Shakespeare. Thursday is the morn, the Ides of May, "The Sea Fight in XCII (La Hogue)," Glover. It fears me quite—its Friday night! and then Nell Cook hath power, "Nell Cook," Ingoldsby Legends, Barham. A Saturday and Monday, "Sally in our Alley," Carey.—Infelix.

Sunday comes apace: And kiss me, Kate, we will be married o' Sunday, act ii., sc. 1 (Petruchio in) "Taming of the Shrew," William Shakespeare. You saw the man—on Monday, was it? (James in) "Walking to the Mail," Alfred Tennyson. Come on Tuesday's coach through Glencoe (you have not seen it), vi., "The Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich," Arthur Clough. And now Ash-Wednesday came—that day but few to church repair, "The Three Graves," Samuel T. Coleridge. Blessedest Thursday's the fat of the week, "Holy Cross Day," Robert Browning. Each week duly as Friday comes, "The Old Cumberland Beggar" (The Period of Old Age), William Wordsworth. That Saturday ye'll fecht him, "Invitation to a Medical Gentleman to Attend a Masonic Anniversary Meeting."—Robert Burns.—C. M. P.

The children came each Sunday there, "In a Country Church," "Songs of Britain," Sir Lewis Morris. And now on Monday next at quarter night, "The Miller's Tale," "Canterbury Tales," Chaucer. But Tuesday night, last gone, in 's garden-house, act v., sc. 1, "Measure for Measure," Shakespeare. On a Wednesday morn of Saint Joseph's-eve, "The Blind Girl of Castel Cuillé," Longfellow. Come dine with us on Thursday next—you must, you know you can, "Nux Postcœnatica," "Humorous Poems," Oliver Wendell Holmes. It fears we quite—it's Friday night!—and then Nell Cook hath pow'r, "Nell Cook," "Ingoldsby Legends," Barham. And celebrate with shouts our opening Saturday, "Punch's Apotheosis," "Rejected Addresses," James and Horace Smith.—Musmé.

You saw the man—on Monday was it? Tennyson, "Walking to the Mail," line 22. Some weeks before Shrove Tuesday comes about, Byron, "Beppo," canto i., line 3. On Wednesday next I shall set out, Shelley, "The Cenci," act ii., sc. 1, line 167. Another was on Thursday brought, Wordsworth, "Goody Blake and Harry Hill," v. 14, line 7. Will on a Friday morn look pale, Scott, Introduction to Canto VI., "Marmion," line 162. On Saturday we will return to France. Shakespeare, "Love's Labour Lost," act iv., sc. 1. Upon a simmer Sunday morn, Burns, "The Holy Fair," v. 6, line 1.—Verbum Sat.

Dosed with vile drams on Sunday he was found, Byron's "Hints from Horace," line 10 from the end. Thou drank wi' Kirkton Jean till Monday, Burns's "Tam o' Shanter," line 28. Even like the deeds that's done. On Tuesday last, Shakespeare's "Macbeth," act ii., sc. 4, line 13. Little doing—for sacred, oh Wednesday, thou art, Thomas Moore's "Memorabilia of Last Week," verse 8, line 1. On Holy Thursday to his city of Rome, Longfellow's "King Robert of Sicily," line 132. Duly as Friday comes, though pressed herself, Wordsworth "The Old Cumberland Beggar," line 38 from the end. On Saturday at night, Charles Mackay's "The Little Man," verse 1, line 6.—Isinglass.

Why such impress of shipwrights, whose sore task does not divide the Sunday from the week? Shakespeare, "Hamlet," act i., sc. 1. You saw the man—on Monday was it? There by the humpback'd willow, Tennyson, "Walking to the Mail." Next Tuesday (as towld in the playbill I mintion'd), T. Moore, "The Fudges in England." And now Ash-Wednesday came that day, Coleridge, "The Three Graves." Another was on Thursday brought, and ere the Sabbath he had three, Wordsworth, "Goody Blake and Harry Gill." Or, mind you fast next Friday, Browning, "Fra Lippo Lippi." Pray, Geromiro, is not Saturday an unpleasant day with those who have but one shirt? Longfellow, "Spanish Student," sc. 2.—Gollywog.

He goes on Sunday to the church, Longfellow, "The Village Blacksmith," verse 5. 'Twas on a Monday then, The corn was steep'd in dew, Sir Walter Scott, "The Battle of Sempach," verse 9. Will you vow to be safe from the headache on Tuesday, and think it will hold, Mrs. Browning, "Lord Walter's Wife," verse 7. Monday! Ha, ha! Well, Wednesday is too soon, Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," act iii., sc. 4. Another was on Thursday brought, and ere the Sabbath he had three, Wordsworth, "Goody Blake and Harry Gill," verse 14. Or, mind you fast on Friday, Browning, "Fra Lippo Lippi," line 318. When Saturday night is market night everywhere, Rosetti, "Jenny," verse 11.—Beppo.

ENTRE NOUS.

A ROMANCING contemporary gives an elaborate account of how the news of the Primate's death reached Balmoral, which is a pure and simple invention from beginning to end, and, moreover, a singularly ill-concocted fiction. We are informed that the news arrived at Balmoral just before luncheon, and "the general sadness" at that meal convinced the Queen that something had happened. On being informed of the Archbishop's death, the Queen "at once entered the telegraph room and personally despatched her message to Mrs. Benson." What a passage of idiotic nonsense! The news did not reach Balmoral till late in the afternoon, and the Queen invariably lunches with the Princess Beatrice only, and never, under any circumstances, with the Household; so that her Majesty could have no knowledge of what was going on at that meal.

Important telegrams are not dealt with either at Balmoral or at any other Palace in the slovenly manner described, as they are opened by the private secretary, and delivered by him to the Queen herself. Her Majesty has not entered the telegraph office at Balmoral for many years. Her message of sympathy, which was despatched on Monday, was principally composed by Princess Beatrice. To any one who has any knowledge of the etiquette of our Court, there is something infinitely ridiculous in the idea of the Queen and Household sitting together at luncheon, and her Majesty addressing a peremptory question to the lady-in-waiting as to the contents of an official telegram addressed to the Queen herself.

On Saturday week the Lord Provost and several of the members of the Corporation of Edinburgh attended at Balmoral and presented the Queen with an address of congratulation on the marriage of Princess Maud of Wales and Prince Charles of Denmark. It was fully expected that the Queen would have knighted the Lord Provost; but her Majesty did not do so, much to the disappointment of some of the deputation. The Corporation party have been severely criticised in Scotland for their flagrant "desecration of the Sabbath," in driving on "the Lord's Day" across the hills from Braemar to Blairgowrie on their way back to Edinburgh. They encountered a frightful storm of sleet and snow in the Spittal of Glenshee, and, having left the carriages in order to view a waterfall, they nearly got lost in making their way back to the vehicles. The austere Presbyterians of Edinburgh declare that if this fate had befallen them, it would have been a "righteous visitation" for their misconduct in travelling on Sunday.

A short time ago the St. James's Gazette made itself supremely ridiculous by announcing that, on the day before the arrival of the Emperor and Empress of Russia at Balmoral, the Queen would observe the anniversary of the battle of the Alma by proposing two toasts (of Thackeray's "British Brandy and Water School") at her dinner-table. Now an egregious weekly journal caps this nonsense by stating that, on November 2, the Queen will have "a special select dinner-party," and celebrate the birthday of the Duke of Kent! Did ever any one out of Bedlam dream of "celebrating the birthday" of a relation who has been dead and buried for nearly eighty years?

It is probable that Prince and Princess Henry of Prussia will accompany the Empress Frederick to England next month. The Empress is to arrive at Windsor Castle a day or two before her birthday, which is on Saturday, November 21.

The Prince of Wales is to pay a visit, after the Newmarket Houghton Meeting, to Mr. and Mrs. William James, at West Dean Park, near Chichester, when he will have a couple of days' pheasant shooting in the extensive coverts on that estate. The first set of guests at Sandringham will be invited to arrive on Saturday, November 7, and there is to be a large shooting party during the following week.

Princess Louis of Battenberg is expected to arrive at Balmoral next week on a visit to the Queen from Darmstadt. Princess Louis and her children will proceed to Malta for the winter about the middle of November.

The Queen of Portugal is coming to England next month, after she has attended the wedding of her brother, the Duc d'Orléans, at Vienna. Queen Amélie will visit the Queen at Windsor Castle, the Prince and Princess of Wales at Sandringham, and the Comtesse de Paris at Woodnorton, the seat of the Duc d'Aumale, near Evesham.

Lord Cadogan has not made himself at home in Ireland, nor filled the office of Viceroy with any enthusiasm. In fact, the rumour still persists that he is anxious to give up the post, and goes to the extent of designating his probable successor. The wish, no doubt, is father to the thought in Ireland, where it is rumoured that Lord Dufferin will probably be the next Irish Viceroy.

No Lord Lieutenant can have any social success so long as he persists in retaining the Household officials whom he is bound to change when he comes into office. The Dublin Castle clique is too strong for the strongest Lord Lieutenant. Its members are the Mayors of the Palace, in whose hands he is powerless. The most curious thing about this conduct of successive Viceroys is that the mismanagement by these officials of the business which is left in their hands is traditional. Each season at Dublin Castle provides a record-breaking list of social blunders and mistakes on their part.

There is no foundation whatever for the report that Lord Onslow "has been selected" to replace Lord Elgin as Viceroy of India, which is palpably ridiculous, inasmuch as Lord Elgin's term has still more than two years to run.

A distracted resident of Hereford-square, S.W., has sent me a lengthy epistle on the perennial question of the German-band and piano-organ nuisance, with which he appears to think his district is afflicted to an exceptional degree. He writes more particularly in the interest of the readers in the public library at the corner of Cranley-gardens, which, for two or three hours on two or three nights each week, is the centre of a perfect pandemonium; but the whole neighbourhood is suffering under this grievance, which, always hard to bear, has latterly become worse than ever, the ear-torturing performers coming oftener and staying later in the evenings than they were at one time content to do. There are few quarters of London from which similar complaints are not heard. The chief difficulty in dealing with the evil seems to be the disinclination of even the most long-suffering householders to go to the police-court and prosecute their tormentors in person, as they are at present required to do, and no doubt some fresh legislation on the subject is desirable. Why not, for instance, establish a close time for these itinerant musicians which would protect the public from their performances during the night at least—say between 8 p.m. and 8 a.m.? But, meanwhile, those who are aggrieved must remember that it is simply a case of "help yourself, and the law will help you." If they will not help themselves, then, of course, they must put up with the consequences.

I have received the following letter from Dr. Lunn in answer to the complaints about the experiences of the passengers by the Midnight Sun. I have not had time to communicate with the passengers who made the complaint, but I cannot help thinking that they must, on their side, have something to say to the statement that they were advised of the intention to coal at Newcastle, and offered free railway tickets to London. As Dr. Lunn's statement stands, it seems to deprive the complaints about the coaling of all justification. I should like to have heard, however, whether notice of the intention to caulk the deck was given too:—

Dear Sir,—In your issue of the 6th inst. you criticise the recent cruise of the s.s. Midnight Sun, and think the management should explain certain matters, which I am glad to say are quite capable of satisfactory explanation.

1. The passengers were informed, a week before the cruise began, that the ship would have to be coaled at Newcastle, and were advised to return by train to London, and in order that they might do so free of expense, as the cruise commenced from Newcastle, we offered return tickets from London at single fares, paying the difference in the cost ourselves. Out of 170 passengers 140 left the vessel at Newcastle, expressing their keen satisfaction with the cruise. The remaining thirty came to Tilbury by sea in very bad weather, to our great regret.

2. Immediately after their return to Tilbury, I issued a printed circular to all the passengers, saying that we wished to pay the dock dues, and cheques were in their possession before your criticism on this point was published.

3. The charges on the wine card correspond to those which have been made by the owners of the vessel during the whole of the Norway Season, and are the ordinary charges on passenger steamers.

4. The sanitary arrangements are those of a first-class steamer.

The increasing success of these cruises is our best answer to the general criticisms contained in your paragraph.—Yours faithfully, Henry S. Lunn.

In reference to recent remarks in Truth on the cruelty involved in the production of the "aigrettes" or "ospreys" worn in ladies' bonnets, one or two naturalists are anxious to inform me that the bird whose plumage passes by that name is not an osprey at all, but a heron. Of this I am aware, and I suppose that the bulk of the public are aware of it too. But, as long as the plumage and the bird are generally known in the trade and among the trade's feminine customers as "osprey," it seems to me that one is more likely to be understood in talking about "osprey" than in talking about "heron." But whatever the name by which the birds are called, the facts remain the same.

A question which exercises me much more is the contention, which has been seriously addressed to me, that the destruction of the heron for the purpose of conversion into "osprey" is excusable, if not justifiable. I happen to have on my staff an enthusiastic angler. He can find no words strong enough to express his feelings about herons—"beastly poaching vermin that kill all your fish." I also have a long letter pooh-poohing the outcry about the horrors of the aigrette trade, and here, again, I find the heron charged with destroying the eggs and young of smaller birds. If the plume hunting is carried on as described, however, it is clearly vile cruelty, and it is no excuse for cruelly torturing one creature that the creature itself preys on others. You would not teach your little boy, I take it, that he was justified in pulling the legs off spiders, and leaving them to die of starvation, because the spiders in turn catch and suck the blood of flies.

As for the angler, he is a pretty witness, certainly, to offer his evidence against the heron. The heron catches fish, and swallows them as expeditiously as possible, for its own living. The angler devotes all the resources of his intellect to tricking a wretched fish into swallowing a hook, hauls it ashore by this instrument of torture, and leaves it to flap itself to death, and all for what? For his own amusement, which he calls "sport," or to get a paragraph recording his prowess in the newspapers. This is the individual who calls herons "vermin," and thinks they may be rightly tortured because they eat the fish and so prevent his torturing the fish for his own amusement.

Red Deer.—The Carbery Hunt is anxious to dispose of two red deer which they have hunted for past two seasons; must sell as they know this country too well; no other fault.—Apply, Secretary of Hunt, Clonakilty.

The above appears in the Cork Constitution. It is one of the funniest side lights on the noble sport of hunting tame deer that I have come across. These two old stagers "know this country too well," and, I suppose, make the course a trifle too stiff for the noble sportsmen of the Carbery Hunt. If no offer has yet been received, let me suggest that the two knowing ones should be hunted in future with their eyes bandaged. That might improve the sport. Or why not make them carry weight?

In the window of a Worcester jeweller's shop there is now exhibited a large silver épergne, which was presented to the late Dean Yorke in 1874, by the congregation of St. Philip's, Birmingham, when he left that parish, on being appointed to the Deanery of Worcester. This article is for sale at a second-hand price, and it may be hoped that it will soon be purchased by some friend or relation of Dean Yorke's, as there is something rather ghastly in seeing presentation plate of this kind going begging in such a doleful fashion.

The Rev. Mr. Le Pla and the gentleman and two ladies named Reed, or Reid, of Clapton, are doubtless walking incarnations of all the virtues, but they possess between them a capacity for imagining evil, and placing an immodest construction on the most harmless acts and words of their fellow-creatures, which would do credit to the most abandoned and dirty-minded sensualist. A diagram representing two pairs of feet—one pair male and the other female—with a suggestion of intoxication about the one and of night garments above the other, fails altogether to convey to this pure-minded party the artist's idea of an interview between an erring husband and a reproachful wife, and tells no tale but an awful and immoral one. A light-hearted damsel comes up to the reverend gentleman, and begins to tell him a story; but he stops her at once, being convinced, out of the imagination of his cleanly heart, that if he had allowed her to go on, it would have been something which he ought not to hear. And then he solemnly comes before the Licensing Committee and produces this awful something, which he imagined himself, as evidence of the undesirable character of the other party, whom he would not allow to speak to him. The ordinary spectacle of a lady on the stage wearing "tights," which I suppose nine out of ten of us have beheld unmoved from the time of our first pantomime, has such an effect upon the feelings of one of the Clapton ladies that she is ready to swear that the "tights" were non-existent, and that she plainly discerned "the texture of the skin." It really looks to me as if Purity Associations exercise a far more demoralising influence than any public entertainment likely to be seen on this side of the Channel.

On the whole, the movement for purifying the music-halls, which started when the County Council was entrusted with the licensing functions, has done a great deal of good, and nobody has more cause to be thankful for it than the proprietors of music-halls. Since 1889 these institutions have taken an entirely new place among our social amusements, and every year their popularity with all classes of society increases. That being so, the enthusiasts for Social Purity would do well to beware of the danger of producing a reaction. Reaction there will certainly be, if Purity persists in making herself the laughing-stock of every individual with a laugh in him. It is to be hoped, therefore, that we have now seen the last of the attempt to regulate the entertainments of London on the principles of a tea-meeting at Ball's Pond.

The production of "The Sign of the Cross" at Boston the other day has evidently caused grave searchings of heart among the elect of the town, and the result was shown in the issue of a "Warning!!" to their Fellow-Christians by "The Open Air Mission." There have been those, Mr. Gladstone among the number, who have regarded "The Sign of the Cross" as a drama of a distinctly religious and edifying tendency; but the Boston Open Air Mission know better. They only see in the play a deeper and more insidious device than usual of the Enemy of Mankind for decoying the unwary soul to perdition, through the door of the playhouse. How deeply and intelligently they have thought about this subject may be judged from the following extract from their "Warning:"— brush—simply so many inventions of the Devil! Where shall we be safe? Apparently only in an open air mission.

At the Richmond Theatre this week Mrs. Bandmann Palmer celebrates her one hundred and fiftieth impersonation of Hamlet. There is a good deal more of the woman than of the man in the hesitating Dane, and, although I never have had the chance of seeing Mrs. Palmer in the character, I can well conceive that so good an actress would make an excellent Hamlet. She ought to receive a medal from the Women's Rights Association for her gallant attempt to annex the part of the Prince of Denmark.

I have been taken to task by a gentleman interested in Irish newspapers for singling out the Irish Times for special condemnation over its review of "Professor" Garner's book. There are plenty of English newspapers, he tells me, that have made themselves equally ridiculous. Nobody can be expected to know everything that appears in every English paper. I can only say that when I find any English contemporary so lamentably ignorant of all that has taken place in regard to the exposure of this arch-impostor, I will gladly do my best to enlighten him. The only one I have come across up to the present time is the editor of the London Echo. On Saturday last that paper gave Garner the benefit of a prominent notice in its columns, and seriously recorded a number of his statements and pretended discoveries, without the faintest hint to the reader that Garner has been conclusively shown to be totally unworthy of credit in anything he says. I can understand that since the criticism I had to pass not long ago on the advertisements published in Mr. Passmore Edwards's journals, TRUTH has been under a boycott at the Echo office, but ignorance of TRUTH is no excuse. Garner was first exposed by a French traveller at a meeting of the Paris Geographical Society, and since then the matter has been widely referred to in the Continental and American Press, as well as in England. I hope we shall not see any more London papers reviewing Garner's book, and taking this charlatan seriously.

If any Parisian, not himself a journalist, were asked who is the cleverest journalist on the French Press, he probably would reply, "Rochefort;" and he would be right, if it be admitted that the cleverest man in journalism is he whose articles are the most appreciated by the readers of newspapers. M. Rochefort has published his memoirs, and we are asked, on the authority of a friend of his grandmother, to believe very extraordinary things in regard to Marie Antoinette and many others. The wife of Louis XVI., according to this gentleman (who incidentally explains that he was himself one of her lovers), had been seduced when a girl at Vienna by Cardinal Rohan. As Queen she was ready to sell herself to any one who would pay the price, and being anxious to secure the famous diamond necklace, she induced the Cardinal to obtain it for her. When the jewellers, who had been cheated out of it, made such a fuss that a public scandal was inevitable, she, the King, the Cardinal, Cagliostro, and Mme. de Lamotte arranged a comedy of a mock trial. They got hold of a girl—the Oliva of history—to admit that she had personated the Queen in an interview with the Cardinal, and it was agreed that she and all others should be acquitted. All this somewhat conflicts with the facts, that the Cardinal was, after a legal acquittal, banished to his diocese, and deprived of his post of Grand Almoner of France, and that Mme. Lamotte was found guilty and was publicly whipped and branded. Beyond the oral evidence of his grandmother's friend, M. Rochefort does not adduce one tittle of evidence in support of this new reading of history, but accepts it as proof positive.

On Napoleon, M. Rochefort is also in a position to relate some curious and novel "facts." When at St. Helena, the ex-Emperor addressed his condolences to Louis XVIII. on the death of the Duc de Berri, and when the Duke of Bordeaux was born, he sent that monarch his congratulations on the succession to the French throne being thus secured in the direct line of the Bourbons. All this M. Rochefort heard from his father. Why these documents, which would have about put an end to Bonapartism, were not published by Louis XVIII., M. Rochefort does not explain.

I have not often read a statement more extravagant than Mr. Clement Shorter's announcement at the opening of his work on the Brontë Family, that "in the whole range of English biographical literature there is no book that can compare in widespread interest with the 'Life of Charlotte Brontë' by Mrs. Gaskell." Certainly a Brontë enthusiast outdoes even a Scotch fanatic on the subject of Burns. Who would ever dream of seriously comparing Mrs. Gaskell's meritorious work with Boswell's "Johnson," or Lockhart's "Scott," or even with Moore's "Byron," or Trevelyan's "Macaulay."

With regard to the recent appointments to the teaching staff of the Northern Polytechnic Institute at Holloway, it would seem from a letter I have received from the Principal that there has been some misunderstanding. He states that there was no arrangement between the Governors of the Polytechnic and the Committee of the Highbury Institute, and that he himself merely informed the teachers at the latter institute that in the event of their qualifications appearing to be equal, or nearly equal, to those of other candidates at the top of the list, he personally thought it would be reasonable to give preference to the Highbury men, but that he could in no way bind the Governors by what he said. It also appears that in the result four out of the ten old teachers who were actually candidates have been appointed to posts at the Polytechnic.

So far back as April 16 I called attention to a very objectionable dodge of advertising a book published by Messrs. H. & C. Treacher, of Brighton. The dodge took the form of an advertisement requesting recipients of appeals for pecuniary assistance in all cases to communicate with "Graduate," care of Messrs. Treacher & Co. The result of such communications was the receipt of an advertisement of a book called "Detrimental Diffusiveness," published by that firm. Recently the advertisements of this same book, and of another by the same author, have taken a more objectionable form, clergymen of various denominations, who are appealing for funds, having been favoured with mysterious post-cards to the effect that after the statements in these books they need not be surprised if their appeals are unsuccessful. In one of the last of these post-cards the name of Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co. is given as the publishers of the book to which attention is directed. A Glasgow clergyman, who complained to Messrs. Treacher of a post-card he had received, was informed in reply that the firm had taken steps to stop the annoyance, for which they expressed regret. But as this was in August last, and the annoyance still continues, the steps taken do not seem to have had the desired result. From what I know both of Messrs. Treacher and Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co., I am confident that both firms will object as strongly as anybody else to this method of advertising their publications, and I hope that the result of these remarks will lead them both to put an extinguisher on the author, who is to all appearance suffering himself from a form of "detrimental diffusiveness."

A paragraph has gone round the papers which states that in 1868 Lord Beaconsfield nominated Bishop Wilberforce for the Archbishopric of Canterbury, but the Queen vetoed the appointment. This is absolutely untrue. In 1868 the Queen had decided that Bishop Tait should be the new Primate, and she announced her choice (which was a most wise one) when Lord Beaconsfield came to her at Windsor with his own recommendation for the vacancy, and his nominee was Bishop Ellicott, of Gloucester and Bristol. Then the Queen proposed that Wilberforce should succeed Tait in the see of London, and his claims for the promotion were undeniable. Lord Beaconsfield, however, would not hear of Wilberforce, and he proposed Dr. Wordsworth (then Canon of Westminster), or the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, the result being that Bishop Jackson was translated to London, and Wordsworth succeeded him at Lincoln.

In 1862, when Dr. Longley was promoted to Canterbury, the Queen urged the appointment of Bishop Wilberforce to the Archbishopric of York, suggesting that Arthur Stanley should replace him in the See of Oxford. Lord Palmerston, however, positively declined to sanction the arrangement, alleging that the one appointment would disgust half his party, while the other would alienate the other half. Palmerston had himself proposed two extreme Low Churchmen for the Archbishoprics—Bishop Baring, of Durham, for Canterbury, and Bishop Waldegrave, of Carlisle, for York, these, of course, being the candidates of Lord Shaftesbury, who was then his minister in such affairs. The Queen wisely vetoed both names, and the Archbishopric of York, having been refused by Tait, Bishop of London, was finally given to Dr. Thomson, who, only a year previously, had replaced Dr. Baring as Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

The Rev. J. H. J. Ellison, who succeeded Canon Gee as Vicar of Windsor and "reader" in the Queen's private chapel at Windsor Castle, is to be appointed Chaplain-in-Ordinary to her Majesty whenever a vacancy takes place. Mr. Ellison is a son of Canon Ellison, and a son-in-law of Archbishop Tait, and therefore brother-in-law to the Bishop of Winchester.

A fund has been started by the Bishop of Exeter for the augmentation of the poor livings in his diocese. A correspondent of one of the county papers points out that whereas Dr. Bickersteth has himself promised an annual contribution, not a farthing has been subscribed by the Dean and Canons of Exeter, either in their official capacity, or individually. This beggarly meanness is very discreditable to those fine dignitaries, who draw upwards of £6,000 a year for their own stipends, and the value of their prebendal houses is certainly not less than £800 a year besides. These stipends, moreover, are not of nominal amount, as at Salisbury, Ely, Winchester, Peterborough, York, Canterbury, and elsewhere. The Chapter of Exeter prudently surrendered their estate to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in return for fixed incomes, so they receive their full stipends in quarterly cheques on the Bank of England.

The case of Llanganten, where, as I recently explained, the vicar is left with a semi-starvation stipend, while the tithes from the parish are taken by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners on account of a "suspended prebend," is, of course, only one example of a by no means uncommon scandal in the Church of England. A Somersetshire parson tells me that there are numerous illustrations of the same system of robbing Peter to pay Paul in that county, one of the worst being found in a parish of 1,500 or 2,000 people, where there is a hard-working incumbent whose income does not exceed £150 a year, if it is so much, while the Commissioners are appropriating a large portion of the funds of the suspended prebend for other places. My correspondent remarks that before money locally derived from a parish is alienated to other places unconnected therewith, the reasonable demands of the incumbent ought to be satisfied. That would be done if any regard were paid to the most elementary principles of justice and honesty in the ordering and management of the financial affairs of the Church, but, unfortunately, these are principles with which ecclesiastical authorities too often appear to be unacquainted.

Another clergyman has brought under my notice the monstrous case of the Vicar of Lancaster's tithe. This vicar draws tithe from some fifteen townships under an Act of Parliament passed in 1824, when wheat was 96s. a quarter. The yearly sum payable to him was fixed on that basis, and remains unaffected by any fall, however great, in the price of wheat, so that this lucky vicar's present income from tithe is about four times more than it would be at the current depreciation. Another advantage which the special Act in question conferred upon the vicar was to relieve him of all trouble and expense in collecting the tithe. The inhabitants of each district elect two householders, who are bound, whether they like it or not, to undertake the collection, and the incidental expenses are borne by the township. Putting aside other questions, and looking at this impost solely from the Church standpoint, could anything more iniquitous be imagined? The Vicar of Lancaster has an income of £1,500 a year; in the same town is another parish, about half the size of his own, where the incumbent has to be content with £179. But the inhabitants of the latter parish are forced to contribute to the Vicar of Lancaster's £1,500, and so also are the inhabitants of a number of other parishes, some of them many miles away from Lancaster, and most of them with very poorly-endowed livings. There is, for instance, one distant scattered country parish where the incumbent's net stipend works out at little more than £3 a week, while from this same parish upwards of £80 a year is taken to swell the income of the Vicar of Lancaster. In view of such gross scandals as these, the Archbishop of York may well express the opinion that the time is arriving for a general readjustment of the income of the Church.

I am sorry that the inference should have been drawn from a paragraph in last week's TRUTH that I impute to the present Archbishop of York responsibility for the position of the Vicar of Scarborough as Bishop of Hull. It has already been mentioned in TRUTH that Archbishop Maclagan did not make Dr. Blunt Bishop of Hull and cannot remove him from the post. Nor is the Archbishop to blame for any of the pluralities enjoyed by this favoured Vicar. Archbishop Thomson, who gave him the Scarborough living, also made Dr. Blunt Rural Dean, Archdeacon, and Canon of York; and Archbishop Magee appointed him Bishop of Hull. The present Archbishop, in point of fact, has done something to reduce the dimensions of the scandal, for he succeeded in persuading Dr. Blunt to give up the archdeaconry. All I would suggest is that he might advantageously use his powers of persuasion a little further.

It is not surprising to read that the pastoral letter which has just been issued by order of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland has evoked a chorus of protests. The meekest and most long-suffering of brethren could hardly fail to resent the arrogant and self-righteous tone in which this precious document lectures them on the duty of giving to the Kirk. Here are one or two edifying extracts:—

> There must be very few among us so pressed with temporal necessities as to be unable to help the cause of our Lord and Saviour. The destitute, of course, must be exempted, but no one is destitute who can afford to procure superfluities; and that much money is wasted by the poorest in the purchase of superfluities is proved by the shops that contrive to flourish among them. Even in the worst of times, except when there is rude interference with economic law, the bare means of subsistence may be obtained by honest labour, but now many gaieties and fancies have become necessaries in all ranks; and so just because we are squandering our earnings in personal indulgence and social extravagance, we have hardly anything to bestow upon the salvation of our fellow-men. Following St. Paul's example, we earnestly exhort you to bring your rendering to the Lord under a system controlled by the Holy Spirit operating through reason and conscience. It will restrain all reckless expenditure, and check those foolish extravagances upon which so much of domestic revenues are wasted.

It would be interesting to learn whether the Moderator who signs the letter, and the other high dignitaries of the Church of Scotland, practise what they preach. Are they content to live as "the poorest" do, even with their superfluities; and do they give everything beyond "the bare means of subsistence" to the Church?

Not only are the clergy invited nowadays to take up agencies for commercial firms, but they are also expected to act (from purely philanthropic motives) as intermediaries in recruiting canvassers for firms needing such work. The following is from a circular issued by Messrs. Richard Evans & Co., of Haydock, Lancashire:—

> REVEREND SIR,—We require in your neighbourhood a few canvassers for coal orders, whom we should pay by commission. The work can be undertaken in leisure hours, and would be a means of augmenting small incomes. It has occurred to us that there may be persons (both ladies and gentlemen), members of your congregation, who would be suitable, and would gladly avail themselves of the opportunity if brought to their notice. May we ask you, therefore, to be good enough to furnish us with the names and full addresses of such persons as you may think eligible?

This enterprising firm go on to allude to the gratitude which other parsons have expressed for such an opportunity of being of use to their parishioners. They do not say anything, however, as to their own gratitude for being thus relieved of the necessity of advertising for canvassers in every different parish.

The Vicar of Stratford-on-Avon again! This time his reverence, backed by the rest of the clergy of Stratford, has declined to attend the annual municipal banquet, because a Baptist minister was asked by the Mayor (himself a Baptist) to say grace at last year's function. If the vicar and his reverend brethren like to assert their dignity by going without their dinners, no one but themselves will be the worse, and the Mayor may save something. The Mayor might do worse than say grace himself this year, and use the witty formula, "Is there a parson present? The Lord make us truly thankful."

A reverend gentleman named Hargraves, located somewhere in Pondoland, is employing the "snowball" idea to obtain prayers and cash at the same time for his missionary work. We have heard in this country of snowball letters designed to obtain a stated number of prayers on behalf of some particular object, but Mr. Hargraves—perhaps wisely—would like to have three stamps forwarded for each prayer offered up. He asks the recipients of his letter, besides contributing the prayers and stamps, to make and transmit two copies, and to continue the process until the number 1,000 is reached. As he should receive countless billions of pounds sterling long before the snowball has multiplied itself to that extent, I should think that there is no doubt that his enterprise, if successful, will lead to a marked extension of Christianity in Africa—always provided that this result can be achieved by collecting cash.

The Irish religious lotteries are becoming a downright scandal. This country is now being flooded with prospectuses and tickets in connection with a "Jubilee Bazaar and Grand Drawing for Prizes," which is to be held in the Rotunda, Dublin, for a religious charity on December 8, under the auspices of the Lord Mayor of Dublin. The first ordinary prize takes the form of shares in the Hibernian Bank to the value of £50, and in addition to this those who sell a certain number of books of tickets are offered bonus tickets with a chance of winning as much as £100 in cash. Why, in the name of wonder, should we employ all the machinery of the law to suppress lotteries in England, and then allow Irishmen to run enterprises of this sort for our benefit—or their own?

With reference to the proposed memorial to the late Sir John Pender, the secretary has written a letter to the Times asserting that it has been all along intended that the whole question of names should be gone into at the first meeting of the Executive Committee. If that is so, how came the official note-paper to bear the following words?—

Object:—To commemorate the inception and extension of submarine telegraphy, associated with the names of Sir John Pender, Sir James Anderson, and Mr. Cyrus Field.

People's intentions must be judged by their actions and language. It may be true that the present intention is as stated by the secretary; but in view of the above words it is difficult to believe that this has been the intention from the first.

A curious ecclesiastical movement is, I hear, on foot in Ireland. Some genius belonging to the Disestablished Irish Church has been inspired with the idea that under the Disestablishment Act army chaplains have no business to be employed in Ireland. Counsel's opinion has actually been taken upon the subject, and I hear that it is in favour of the ecclesiastics' contention. The progress of the movement is watched with specially keen interest by the garrison of Dublin, who are specially afflicted by the sermons of one particular divine on the Army clerical staff.

Apropos of medical examinations for Army cadets, here is another case which shows the erratic way in which medical boards sometimes do their work. A young man who had qualified for a Cavalry commission was rejected by the doctors on the ground that his height and chest-measurement were insufficient. His father bestirred himself, and got permission for his son to have another chance. The youth was then put through a course of gymnastics, and by this means was sufficiently lengthened and widened to satisfy his next board. This time, however, the doctors discovered that he was defective in the matter of teeth, and once more he was "spun." This is very like a case mentioned in TRUTH a few months ago, where, after the adverse finding of one board had been refuted by the opinions of two eminent civil practitioners, an officer went before a special board, which disqualified him on the strength of another ailment, which the previous board had not discovered. It is a monstrous thing that a man should be permanently debarred from a career for reasons about which even doctors cannot agree; and most certainly when a man has been passed in every respect but one, and subsequently obtains a favourable verdict on this one point, he ought not to have new grounds for rejection trumped up against him.

I have expressed my doubts recently about the necessity for the strictness in regard to eyesight at present exercised in Army examinations. Some people do not agree with me on this point; but in the name of goodness how can any one justify the disqualification of an officer on the ground that his teeth are defective? He is not going to fight the enemy with his teeth. He does not want a complete set of natural teeth to enable him to lead his men, or give the word of command. If there is one direction more than another in which art is now able to supply the deficiencies of nature, it is in regard to teeth; and it is difficult to see a single reason which would make artificial teeth more inconvenient to an officer in the Army than they are to the hundreds and thousands of civilians who wear them without disadvantage of any kind. If anything, I should say that a man who goes into battle with a set of artificial teeth might have the advantage over a man equipped with his natural grinders, for in the event of a bullet in the mouth he would suffer far less pain, and the damage could be more easily repaired, or he might, for fear of such a mishap, take his teeth out before the battle commenced, and put them in his pocket. He would then be, in case of accident, at a still greater advantage over his brother officer who depended upon the teeth with which nature had provided him.

One of the "Service" papers got itself into a state of rapturous delight the other day over the "magnificent demonstration" accorded to Colonel Ponsonby on his taking leave of the 2nd Berkshire at Devonport. This magnificent demonstration was discovered to be a crushing answer to what has been said in TRUTH and elsewhere (including the House of Commons) as to the unsatisfactory condition of things in the battalion for some time past. Where the reports of what passed came from, those who published them alone know. Here is an account of the proceedings sent to me by an eye-witness, and it accords much more with the probabilities than the particulars supplied (officially, I suppose) to the War Office organ:—

> From the account referred to it would appear that the soldiers turned out to a man and cheered to the echo. What was the actual condition here? Simply and truthfully as follows:—
> Some time before the Colonel left it was known what time he would depart—1.15 p.m., in the day. The expressions I heard were entirely to the effect that it was a "good job, too," and the men had quite made up their mind to take no notice whatever of the event. Shortly before 1 o'clock, however, the men were warned to be on the parade-ground and cheer—cheers made to order. They were hunted (with threats of the guard-room) out to the parade-ground by the N.C.O.s, and the band was on the officers' mess verandah. When the Colonel appeared, the band, of course, struck up the regimental march past. The troops maintained a stolid and painful silence till the Colonel turned round and waved his hat, then a few slight, half-hearted cheers (led by colour-sergeants, &c.) were given by the half of the battalion nearest the departing officer, the other half being perfectly silent. As he walked away he shook hands with the band-master, the music changed to "Auld Lang Syne," and continued at that till he was out of sight. Then the troops returned to their now cold dinners.

I am glad to be able to add to this, however, that by all accounts there is every probability of a very different condition of things developing in this battalion under the officer now commanding. I trust that nothing will prevent its continuing to develop.

Two officers in the Bengal Cavalry returning to India recently as second-class passengers on a P. & O. ship, found one of the berths in their cabin occupied by a private soldier who was returning to Malta from furlough. The degradation of sleeping in the same cabin with this humble individual seems to have been too much for the fortitude of the two officers. They first tried, through the steward, to induce the soldier to give up his berth. Failing in this, they slept for two or three nights on the dining table in the saloon, after which the captain, taking pity on their outcast condition, installed them in a first-class cabin. Possibly I am wanting in a proper sense of the great gulf which separates a Cavalry officer from a private soldier, but it does seem to me that these officers cut rather a ridiculous figure in the story. People, military or civil, who cannot put up with second-class company should not take second-class tickets.

I am informed that, at last month's meeting of the sergeants mess of the Highland Light Infantry, a letter was read from the wife of the quartermaster-sergeant, who is reported to be interested in a stationer's shop just outside the barracks, and that in this letter the lady offered to supply the mess with the London dailies at a reduction of one half-penny off the price of each, and all sixpenny periodicals at a reduction of one penny. If this statement is accurate, it goes a long way to prove the justice of one of the objections made to shopkeeping by an N.C.O. or his wife. It is certain that the London dailies cannot be supplied at a half-penny discount except at a loss, and although sixpenny periodicals could be sold at fivepence, and still leave a microscopical margin of profit to the vendor, it would not pay any newsagent to supply papers on these terms, except from some ulterior motive. I have already contended that for a soldier on full pay to be keeping shop in a garrison town is an injustice to the other shopkeepers, who in their character of taxpayers contribute towards providing his army pay; and if this particular N.C.O., or his wife, is undertaking a "cutting" trade of the above description, it shows that they have an advantage in competition with rival traders in the same line of business. There ought to have been some official inquiry before this into the position of this non-commissioned stationer, and I trust it will not be much longer delayed.

The following strange tale of the Army reaches me from India on what seems to me unquestionable authority. An N.C.O. in a company of garrison artillery, stationed at Fort Delhi, extended his service in January last to complete his twenty-one years with the colours, on the understanding that the C.O. would recommend him for a furlough to England. The recommendation was given in due course, but the man was not able to leave, for want of a vacancy in a troop ship. In July the man renewed his application for the ensuing season, when the C.O. refused to recommend him, giving as his reason, so I am told, that the man had been too long in India, and was unfit for further service in the country. On the face of it, this would seem a very good reason for allowing him a change to England, and even if the C.O.'s view were that the man ought to leave India for good, and not for a mere temporary holiday, the least he ought to do is to take some steps for that purpose. But the most singular part of the story is that a man who was medically passed as fit for the completion of his twenty-one years only in January last should now be pronounced by his C.O. unfit to serve out his time in India. Either the C.O. or the medical officer who passed the man must be very much mistaken. As the N.C.O. in question is only twenty-eight years of age, is six feet high, and weighs about fourteen stone, while he is described by my informant as a man of robust appearance, it does not seem probable that the mistake was on the side of the medical officer.

The following extract from a military letter speaks volumes:—

> We have an Army Service Corps officer in charge of the barracks here, but as he was only commissioned (from the ranks) last year, he is not yet approachable by ordinary mortals.

About three months back I mentioned the case of a warrant officer of the Medical Staff Corps on a colonial station, who had managed to shunt the whole of his duties on to his juniors, with the exception of the pay and clothing. I now hear that this particular warrant officer is an industrious, hard-working individual compared with a brother warrant officer in a station hospital in the West Indies, who has managed to get rid of the pay and clothing duty as well as all the rest. At this hospital the duties in connection with the medical store are performed by a clerk, those in connection with the clothing and equipment by a staff sergeant, and the pay duties by a sergeant. Such a state of things must be to a considerable extent the fault of the medical officer in charge.

The latest enteric fever inquiry board sat at Richmond Barracks, Dublin, on Saturday last, to inquire this time into the case of "Dr. Marshall," 2nd Scots Guards. I am afraid, as I told the British Medical Journal last week, that "Dr." in military usage stands for "drummer." If only a doctor had got enteric fever, there might be a chance of the inquiry producing some result—though a Colonel or a Major-General would be better still.

Some of the senior N.C.O.s on the Permanent Staff of the 4th Battalion Leinster Regiment are much exercised over an announcement that a vacancy, which will occur in two or three months' time, for a quartermaster-sergeant, has been promised to a colour-sergeant with over twenty-six years' service. There is a good deal to be said on behalf of the men who resent this arrangement. A man promoted after twenty-four years gains no increase of pay thereby, and at the same time stands in the way of other men obtaining an increase, as well as blocking promotion all down the line. In the most favourable circumstances it is difficult enough for a sergeant to obtain his full pension; and in what is nominally a short-service Army, there is something incongruous in allowing men, not only to hang on, but actually to gain promotion to the detriment of their juniors, after completing over five-and-twenty years' service.

Much comment has been excited by an advertisement which appeared the other day in the Aldershot News, emanating from the bandmaster of the Depot of the Hants Regiment, and asking for sergeants for the Permanent Staff of the Militia Battalion. I am only an ignorant civilian, and possibly this may be all regular and in the usual course. But I confess I should like to know why it is left to the bandmaster at a regimental Depot to advertise for sergeants for the Permanent Staff.

By the way, there is no more frequent complaint among N.C.O.s of the Militia Permanent Staff than their obligations in regard to unpaid recruiting. As it is clearly laid down that recruiting is part of the ordinary duty of the Permanent Staff, it cannot be said in this instance that the men are saddled with anything that is not in their contract; but a serious grievance is created by the conspicuous distinction between the position of paid and unpaid recruiters. On the one hand, paid recruiting is very good business for the men who get the job, a colour-sergeant employed on this duty drawing in pay and allowances an aggregate of about 6s. 2d. per diem, while a company-sergeant-major, with his additional pay, gets as much as 7s. 7½d.—a very handsome salary. On the other hand, recruiting duty imposes on a man the necessity of separating himself from his wife and family, or taking them with him at his own expense; and also involves a good many incidental expenses through moving about, and being out of doors in all weathers. It is therefore very natural that the unpaid recruiter should grumble at his own position when compared with that of his paid comrade, and that he should ask himself why this distinction is drawn. It is difficult to see any answer to this question, and it seems to me that it would be fairer to the men, and lead them to perform their work in a better spirit, if all engaged on this duty were paid on the same principle.

The European instructors of the Chinese troops appear to have a rough time of it, and they have been subjected to gross insults for endeavouring to enforce military discipline. A German officer, who was drilling a regiment at Nankin, near the Viceroy's yamen, having been struck from his horse with a spear, was then surrounded by the soldiers and most brutally ill-treated. He had a narrow escape of his life. The German instructors, (thirty in number) have all been withdrawn from Nankin, and they are now quartered in forts near Shanghai. The officer who was injured has received £1,000 as compensation, and his assailants have been severely punished. Experts declare that it is utterly impossible to make the Chinese army effective, as the troops know nothing of discipline, and they furiously resent any attempt to enforce it.

In a paragraph concerning the Thana Forest rules the Deccan Herald the other week mentioned that a collection of Kathodis, Thakoors, and other wild tribes, numbering nearly 4,000, had assembled at Thana and prayed the collector to cancel "the recently-published proclamation depriving them of their birthright to bring head-loads and carts of dead firewood from the forest, the sole means of their bare livelihood." It so chanced that in its next issue the same paper announced the net revenue from Indian forests during the past year as about 86 lakhs or about 4½ lakhs more than in the previous year. One would like to know to what extent this increase of revenue is attributable to such oppressive regulations as that against which the unfortunate denizens of the Thana Forest district appealed. From the policy which is being pursued it might almost be concluded that the extinction of these wild tribes is being aimed at; and a correspondent suggests that a paternal government might not only more speedily achieve this end but at the same time tap a further source of revenue by taxing rats and other vermin which constitute the principal diet of the tribes, so that they would then be cut off both from food and firing.

Why on earth do the Indian Army Regulations prohibit barbers, in company with shoe-blacks and polishers of arms, from entering the barracks of British troops? Native barbers, I believe, attend regularly on officers in their quarters, and if an officer can be shaved without any evil consequences by a native barber, it is difficult to see any reason why the same convenience should not be allowed to N.C.O.s and the rank and file, always provided they are in a position to pay for it. In point of fact, I am told that the rule is to a great extent a dead letter, and that native barbers frequently do come in to shave Thomas, without doing him any serious injury; but every now and then the regulation is suddenly enforced, and Atkins is left to scrape his chin for himself as well as he can. Men are to be found in all stations of life who never can handle a razor with safety to themselves, and to compel such men to shave themselves may be only one degree removed from ordering them to perform the Happy Despatch.

The military authorities could not do a better service to the private soldier than by taking steps to stop the various tricks by which an improvident Tommy is at present able to obtain a cash advance, more especially in India. At many Indian stations a regular money-lending business, marked by all the worst abuses of the usury trade, is now carried on, partly by native traders who are privileged to do business with the regiments, partly by non-commissioned officers. At different times many instances of this sort of thing have been given in TRUTH, but here are a few more, which have a special significance, because they all come from one station, and therefore show what a regular organised business is done in this direction.

A man finding himself short of cash obtains from his squadron quarter-master-sergeant (this particular instance is taken from a cavalry regiment) an order for a suit, or some article of clothing. He takes this order to the regimental tailor's shop, and there discounts it in cash for about 75 per cent. of its face value. Nothing more occurs until, at the end of the month, he finds himself debited on his pay-sheet with the price of the clothing he is supposed to have had. In the regiment to which I am referring the current rate of discount on an order for a suit of blue serge, value Rs. 13, is Rs. 10 in cash. An order for a suit of khaki, value Rs. 6. 8 a., is discounted at Rs. 5, and so on. The rate of interest per annum represented by these figures is worthy of the most voracious shark in the usury trade. Native tailors who do minor repairs also advance small sums at corresponding rates of interest, charging the sum against the soldier's account under the head of repairs.

Again, a coffee-shop is kept by a native under the supervision of a lance-corporal. Credit is allowed to the extent of Rs. 6 per month, the idea being to enable a man to get a good supper, whether he happens to have the money in his pocket or not. Refreshments are obtained on credit by means of tickets obtained from the lance-corporal in charge, and these tickets are turned into cash precisely in the same way as the orders for clothing above described—that is to say, instead of serving a man with supper, the native manager gives him twelve annas in cash for a ticket valued at one rupee. The balance represents his interest on the advance for a month, or possibly only for a week or so, when the matter is settled up through the soldier's account. I may add that, as if such facilities for obtaining loans were not sufficient, there is a corporal in the regiment to which I am referring who does a regular money-lending business with his comrades at the rate of two annas per rupee per week. I am no advocate for grandmotherly methods of management, whether in public or private affairs, and if Tommy is such a fool as to sell a rupee at the end of the month for twelve annas to-day, he is the party most to blame. Some of the tricks above described, however, obviously involve a fraudulent misuse of official machinery, and I think there can be no question that such practices ought to be stopped.

Surely it ought to be a general rule in military hospitals that orderlies who contract enteric fever while nursing cases of this disease should not be subjected to loss of pay, or, at any rate, of their full pay. The matter is brought under my notice from Bermuda, where in twelve months four men out of a detachment of six contracted enteric fever while on hospital duty. All of these men, two first and two second-class orderlies, lost their pay for about ten weeks. If this is not done, it seems to me that these men ought to receive extra pay for the risk they ran, as I believe they do in "isolated" cases, enteric fever not being "isolated." Another complaint from Bermuda—I do not know whether it extends to other stations—is that orderlies in attendance upon such cases are not allowed to wear hospital clothing. There are strong objections against the men attending enteric-fever cases in their ordinary clothes, and I think those who understand the facts will readily admit this.

The paragraph in the Queen's Regulations which allows men who have completed eight years' continuous service abroad to register their names for transfer to the home battalion is, like a good many other kindred regulations, somewhat delusive in its operation. For instance, I have a case before me of a man whose service dates from September. The list being sent in to the Adjutant-General in July, this man will have completed eight years and ten months before his name gets on the register, and he will then have little chance of getting away from India before the following spring, when he will have completed nine years and six months' service. This Regulation was modified not long ago for the benefit of men re-engaging abroad, who had previously been liable to serve ten or even eleven years abroad before they could get away. I would suggest that it should be further modified to meet such cases as the one above specified. This could easily be done by allowing a man who would complete his eight years during the trooping season to register his name in advance.

I am glad to hear that the paragraph in TRUTH of the 1st inst. respecting the running of watch clubs by a corporal in the 2nd Scots Guards has had the desired effect, and the thanks of all parties are due to the Commanding Officer for the prompt notice taken of the matter. I mention this little incident for the benefit of any other regiments in which similar clubs may be conducted; for the system is a thoroughly bad one, and ought to be summarily suppressed whenever it is brought to light.

CARPET BEATING SEASON.—The Queen says: "A good place to send carpets to is the Compressed Air Carpet and Tapestry Cleaning Company, Brook Green, Hammersmith, W. Dust blown out. No beaters used." To prevent deception carpets cleaned by this process bear the Trade Mark on the back.

Some remarks which seem well worth notice were addressed to me the other day in reference to the practice of officering Irish regiments exclusively with Englishmen. In a well-known Irish regiment now quartered in its native country, there is, I believe, not a single officer who can call himself an Irishman; and from various facts recited it would seem that there is, owing to this circumstance, a conspicuous lack of sympathy and touch between officers and men. Possibly, an English leaven in an Irish regiment might improve the quality of the whole lump, just as an English regiment may be improved by a little Scotch blood. A judicious blend of the nationalities generally produces a superior article. But when all the officers are of one nationality, and all the rank and file of another, the probability is that there will be no blend at all, any more than in a mixture of oil and vinegar. And that seems to be precisely the mischief in the regiment I have referred to.

There are a few more little military grievances which seem to deserve pillorying. The two matters reported from the 2nd Battalion Royal Scots are of special interest in view of a statement made to me that in the last six years only about six privates of this battalion have extended their service, and that something like 140 are leaving during the present trooping season. These figures dispose one to believe that there is some lack of consideration and judgment in the management of the regiment:—

2nd Battalion, Royal Scots, Mandalay.—In April, 1895, new tunics were issued to this battalion instead of the serge frocks to which the men were entitled under the existing regulations. This seems to have been done at the desire of the then Commanding Officer, who was displeased with the condition of many of the tunics in wear. The men were at the same time charged the difference in value between a tunic and a serge frock, namely Rs.4 9 a.; but were told that in the following year, when they would receive a serge frock instead of a tunic, the difference would be refunded. When the time came, however, for the issue of the 1896 clothing, the men were informed that new regulations had come into force, that no more tunics were to be issued, and that accordingly the men would receive neither tunic nor compensation. The result of this is that the greater part of the battalion, about five hundred of them altogether, who did not want a new tunic in 1895, are Rs.4 9 a. out of pocket—a good example of the results of the constant muddling and trickery that goes on over the clothing regulations in India.

In this same battalion, about two months ago, a man was sentenced by the C.O. to 168 hours' hard labour, and twenty-one days' C.B., on a charge of having annoyed a Nursing Sister at the station hospital by entering the compound of her bungalow, and looking in at her window. The man seems to have been punished purely on suspicion, and without any definite evidence whatever. Subsequently a guard of three men was placed on the Nursing Sister's quarters, and, although the lady who made the complaint had left the station, and her quarters had been empty for a fortnight, the guard was still doing this duty up to the time when the last mail left India, very much to the disgust of the men so employed.

Depot, Essex Regiment, Warley.—In this Depot there are, it seems, for some reason no paid lance-corporals. Several privates are therefore regularly doing corporal's duty without receiving extra pay, and the work imposed upon them is so heavy that it may fairly be described as "sweating." In several of the Depots there is a large staff of paid lance-corporals, and it would be interesting to know for what reason the work is at Warley thrown on private soldiers.

2nd Battalion, The Buffs, Kilkenny.—Several men of this battalion have lately been in hot water for not having the butt-plates of their rifles burnished. Official instructions have been issued (and I believe a copy of them is exhibited in most barrack rooms) directing that no hard substance of any sort is to be used in cleaning the Lee-Metford rifle. For the burnishing of a butt-plate it is necessary to use a steel burnisher, which is certainly a hard substance, and must, at any rate, wear away the plate in a very short time. The burnishing of the butt-plates in the 2nd Buffs is carried out under a regimental order, and it would seem to be worth the consideration of the authorities whether this order is consistent with the official instructions for the care and cleaning of the rifles.

Army Pay Corps, Woolwich.—For some unknown reason the corporals of the Army Pay Corps stationed at Woolwich are not allowed the privilege of wearing sergeant's stripes. This is allowed at Portsmouth and other stations, and, when it is allowed, the corporals are entitled to become members of a mess, a privilege which is highly appreciated. Surely there ought to be one rule in this respect for all stations.

Medical Staff Corps.—In June last an order was issued by the Director-General of the Army Medical Department that the duties of steward, compounder, storekeeper, &c., should be discharged by different N.C.O.s in turn, with a view to improving their general efficiency. At several station-hospitals this order has been absolutely ignored, and considerable curiosity exists among the junior N.C.O.s as to when it is to come into force, many of the men being as anxious as the authorities to extend their knowledge of their duties. It seems desirable that some reminder on the subject should be issued, or other steps taken to insure the order being carried out.

In reference to the Depot of the Essex Regiment, which again figures in my Military Pillory, I hear that some one in authority has adopted a curious method of marking his appreciation of my comments, each number of TRUTH containing an allusion to the Depot having had the passage cut out and abstracted before the paper was placed in the library. It would be interesting to know what the party who has adopted this method of censorship expects to gain thereby. The only result, so far as the Depot is concerned, is, of course, to accentuate the passage thus dealt with; while, as far as I am concerned, it leads to several copies of TRUTH being bought instead of one. If any Commanding Officer who resents TRUTH criticism would like to adopt the Russian plan, and have all the military comments blotted out of the papers before they are allowed to enter a regimental institute, I am sure that he is heartily welcome to do so, as far as I am concerned.

The story told by a man lately discharged from H.M.S. Camperdown, in the Mediterranean, is well worthy of the attention of the British public. The man in question, Charles Paine by name, has been in the Navy since October, 1881, and was serving on the Camperdown up to a few weeks back in the capacity of a blacksmith, with a second-class rating. In August last Paine lost a chisel, which he had made for himself for work in the barbette. He subsequently found it in the possession of another man, and repossessed himself of it. Being called upon by the boatswain to give it up, he maintained that it was his own, and the matter was reported to the Commander. On going before the Commander Paine explained that he had the best means of recognising the chisel, having made it himself, whereupon the boatswain, obviously conscious that the case looked weak, preferred a further charge against him of using improper language when interrogated about the chisel. Three witnesses, present at the time, were called on this point, and denied that they had heard any improper language; but, the boatswain having explained that the alleged words were uttered in a low tone of voice, the Commander sent the case to the Captain.

Paine seems then to have claimed a court-martial, but the Commander-in-Chief declined to order it—presumably on the ground that there was no evidence worthy of the name on which to try the man. The matter, therefore, came again before the Captain, and, on being asked whether he wished the evidence re-heard, Paine replied that he would leave it in the Captain's hands as it stood.

The same afternoon he was informed that his services were no longer required, and a couple of hours later he was put on board a cutter for conveyance to England. A more extraordinary example of justice as administered in the Navy I have never heard of. On the merits of the case, the evidence seems to have been wholly in Paine's favour; and even if that were not so, he was surely entitled to trial by court-martial before such an extravagant punishment as expulsion from the Service was imposed on him. Even had he been convicted by court-martial, a brief term of imprisonment would have been an adequate and legal sentence for his offence. As it is, without any formal trial, and with the evidence pointing entirely in his favour, he has been deprived of his berth after fifteen years' service, as well as of the prospective pension which he was within five years of earning. He has had nothing in the shape of compensation for such dismissal, and he is prejudiced in obtaining civil employment by a serious slur on his character. I respectfully suggest to Mr. Goschen and his colleagues at the Admiralty that this is another case calling at least for inquiry, and probably for redress.

The court-martial on the China station which has been trying Captain Hallifax and Navigating-Lieutenant Loane on a charge of negligence, arising out of the stranding of H.M.S. Undaunted, has resulted in the charge being found proved. The sentence was that Captain Hallifax should be "reprimanded," and Lieutenant Loane "severely reprimanded." It is interesting to compare this sentence with that passed by the Blake court-martial, where, although the charge of negligence was only found to be "partly proved," both prisoners were "severely reprimanded," and in addition dismissed their ship. Here is a heavier sentence given, not only on a charge which was merely "partly" proved, but also for a less serious offence, the negligence in the Undaunted case placing the ship and the lives of the whole crew in jeopardy.

By the way, in reference to my remarks last week on the Blake court-martial, I have received the following from a gentleman whom I think I am justified in saying is somewhat interested in the matter:—

> The Admiralty have recently adopted a new standard water gauge, which is being fitted to all ships as occasion arises. The fact that H.M.S. Blake has been fitted with a more efficient pattern of water gauge, does not, therefore, involve a confession that the previous pattern was in any way the cause of the accident. The defective state of the water gauge was the result of an act of stupidity on the part of the artificer, which, even if it has ever occured before, must be extremely rare. The same act of stupidity would have rendered inefficient any water gauge in the Mercantile Marine.

I do not quite see how this imputation of the whole blame to an artificer is to be reconciled with the finding of the court-martial; and my doubts on the subject are increased by the fact that a Service journal—which I hope it is not rash to credit with some amount of technical knowledge—has drawn from the accident the moral that the provision of the new type of water gauge should be hurried up. It may be true that the fitting of the new water gauge on the Blake "does not involve a confession that the previous pattern was in any way the cause of the accident," but it seems to me to suggest very strongly the inference that a more efficient pattern of water gauge would reduce the probability of such accidents in future.

One of the Cape Town papers has interviewed the local officials of the chief Steamship Companies in reference to the complaints of rowdyism among second-class passengers on voyages to the Cape, which I noticed on August 27. It is evident, however, that the representative of my contemporary must either have misapprehended the replies to his inquiries, or else he must have been deliberately misled. He reports, for instance, that the Union Office "emphatically declared that no complaints had been received." It so happens that I have now before me some correspondence which had passed only two or three weeks previously between the chief agent of the Union Line at Cape Town and an aggrieved second-class passenger. This man sailed by the Goth from Southampton as a third-class passenger, but on the voyage he changed to the second-class, paying the difference between the two fares. He asserts that he was subjected to most offensive treatment at the hands of two of his fellow-passengers, one of them using actual violence towards him, and that though the captain and officers were courteous enough, they failed to afford him proper protection. Having made inquiries, the chief agent at Cape Town, Mr. T. E. Fuller, wrote to him as follows:—

> I much regret that any incivility was shown you by your fellow-passengers; but as you say the officers of the ship behaved with the greatest kindness and courtesy, I do not consider we are in any way responsible for the same.

This shows a lack of appreciation of the duties and responsibilities of the company towards their customers which will not, I trust, be endorsed at headquarters. What Mr. Fuller euphemistically describes as "incivility" was, in reality, very disgraceful ill-usage; and it would certainly be an extraordinary thing for the managers of the line to take up the position that it is no concern of theirs to interfere in such matters, and that a passenger is to be left at the mercy of any cads and roughs who like to while away the time by insulting and annoying him. The statements that have reached me prove, however, that blackguardism of this kind is by no means uncommon on the Cape liners, and the captains ought to be instructed to deal with it more firmly than they at present seem disposed to do.

Many a time have I commented in TRUTH on the servile attitude of the Indian Press towards local officialism. Nothing that I may hear in this direction will come as news to me, but the following remarks of a journalist who has had considerable experience in India may interest some of my Indian readers, and goes far to justify what I have said on the subject:—

> Had you known the character of the ——, you would not have wasted so much attention upon it as you did in TRUTH of July 30. The —— is the most servile of a servile set. Its contributors are constantly cautioned to avoid all allusion to any matter, official or private, derogatory to officialdom. It will erase sentences and whole paragraphs out of narratives, law reports, and the like, even to the destruction of the sense, rather than bring embarrassment or unpleasantness to the household of any official in an exalted position. The same thing might be said, in a greater or less degree, of nearly all the leading Indian papers. As a class, they are not a medium for news, but for the suppression of facts and the fabrication of falsehoods. Each of the newspapers has a special correspondent at the Viceregal Court. When the Viceroy is at Simla these correspondents summer there. When the Viceroy travels, or comes to rest at Calcutta, they move in his train and settle in Calcutta during the Viceregal stay. During the Simla season they convey little news regarding any of the important political, financial, and other questions of the day, but are invariably used by the various Members of Council and heads of departments as mediums for the promulgation of the official version of any abuse or scandal that may be exposed by a less favoured, and therefore "scurrilous," paper. The article on the "Invalid Trooping Horrors," for instance, on which TRUTH comments at such length, was more likely than not actually written at one of the military headquarter offices. For the rest, Indian newspapers are devoted to the social business of the season. Take up any of the leading journals for the six months from April to October, and you will find telegrams and columns of matter, not relating to debates in Council on any subject pertaining to the welfare and administration of the country, but to theatricals, balls, children's parties, picnics, pony races, dinners at the club, promotions and transfers of popular members of society, &c., &c. If the entire Indian Administration were an honest one, pandering organs of this class could not exist, because they would not be tolerated. As it is, they are subsidised with scraps of official news, and in every way patronised and encouraged in official circles.

The foregoing remarks explain very clearly the enormous volume of correspondence which reaches TRUTH Office by every mail from India. Anglo-Indians, civil and military, would not go to the expense and trouble of invoking the services of a London editor to let the light in upon the dark corners of Indian administration, if they saw any medium of independent and fearless criticism nearer at hand. I do not complain of this, and I am always glad to be of any service I can to my Indian readers; but it often occurs to me that there must be a great opening for a few really able, well-conducted, and honest daily papers in India.

By later Indian mails I have had particulars of some other cases bearing on the unreasonable delay of the Government in deciding cases referred to them as to the title of certain civilians to the Exchange Compensation Allowance. It was mentioned the other day how a man who had first been granted the allowance by one official, and then deprived of it by another official of lower rank, had been waiting for eighteen months for the decision of the financial authorities on his case, and could ascertain nothing but that there was no prospect of a decision being arrived at for many months more. There seem to be dozens of men in the same position, and some of them are struggling public servants with very exiguous incomes, to whom the cost of maintaining children in England at the present rate of exchange is almost ruinous. The least that the Government can do, if it has any serious doubts about the rights of these people to the allowance, is to appoint some special machinery for inquiring into and disposing of their cases.

Writing on the exclusion of native Government servants from the benefits of the Exchange Compensation Allowance, an officer of the Indian Medical Staff comments rather forcibly on the limitations of the benefits of the Indian Service Family Pension Fund. Every officer joining the military and medical Services is compelled to become a subscriber to this fund. The fund insures a pension in sterling to widows and dependants in case of premature death, but is entirely limited to that; so that if the subscriber survives his wife and settles his children comfortably before his own death he gets absolutely nothing in return for the thousands of rupees he will have subscribed. As the fund is very prosperous and the donations and subscriptions vary at present with the rate of exchange, it is suggested that at least the Government might allow the benefits of the Exchange Compensation Allowance to subscribers—that is to say, fix all subscriptions at a uniform rate of exchange—say 1s. 6d. to the rupee.

Only a few months ago great surprise was created among public servants in Ireland by the importation of a railway manager, Mr. T. Robertson, into the important and lucrative post of Chairman of the Board of Works. The soreness and disquietude which this appointment created have barely had time to subside ere Mr. Robertson has himself raised a fresh and more serious storm by bringing in another outsider to fill the newly-established berth of Assistant-Secretary to the Board. Whatever excuse there may have been for the selection of Mr. Robertson for the chairmanship, there is absolutely none for his bestowal of the assistant-secretaryship on one of his former subordinates on the Great Northern Railway. It is perfectly preposterous to suppose that in a large department like the Irish Board of Works (to say nothing of the general body of Civil servants in Dublin) men could not be found better qualified for such a berth than the whilom master of a country railway station. The appointment is, in fact, a job of the worst and most barefaced kind, and it is small wonder that it has produced a strong feeling of resentment and indignation among all grades of Civil servants in Dublin.

The following is one of the finest examples of Post Office intelligence that I have come across for some time. A certain noble Duke was away from London, and his town house, like those of most of the aristocracy, was in charge of the caretaker and the cat. A letter was sent from the Duke's country seat, addressed "The Caretaker, The Duke of ——, &c." This letter the Post Office neither delivered nor opened, but straightway sent it back again to the Duke's country seat, from which it had started. Whether the intelligent official who took this course supposed that the caretaker of the London house was, like the rest of his Grace's establishment, staying at the country seat, or whether no thought whatever was given to the subject, must be left to conjecture, but the second explanation is the more probable.

Gradually common-sense seems to be prevailing at Eastbourne. A public meeting held last week authorised the application of the Corporation to Parliament for powers to deal with the water supply, thus reversing the decision arrived at last year—and reversing it by a large majority. The opposition, who only mustered about forty or fifty strong, demanded a poll, which will have to be taken; but when the opinion of the whole body of ratepayers is obtained, I should imagine that the result will only be the more decisive.

Not a little of the fierce spirit of the Kilkenny cats appears to survive in the faction fights of the Kilkenny Corporation. At last week's meeting of this body there was a vigorous and prolonged exchange of compliments between the Mayor and Councillor O'Keeffe, "low coward," "dirty thing," "botheen boy," "bostoon," "common cur," and "lickspittle," being mild samples of the epithets which were bandied about. Becoming tired of mere verbal warfare, O'Keeffe at one stage of the proceedings seized the Mayor by the nose, and threatened "to tweeze it off," declaring that he was "a low scoundrel;" but his worship declined to be drawn into a physical encounter, and contented himself with calling his assailant a "low blackguard." Finally, during the Mayor's temporary absence from the council-chair, somebody put an empty beer-barrel in his chair, after which affront his worship adjourned the meeting. What sort of citizens must they be who select such rowdies as these for their municipal representatives?

I see it is announced that Lord Warwick has consented to serve as Mayor of Warwick for a third year. Without any desire to disparage his services, I should have been rather inclined to put the requisition to him to accept office again down to the spirit of snobbishness and toadyism which is, unfortunately, becoming so prevalent in municipal life, had I not chanced to receive a letter from a burgess of Warwick, which suggests a different explanation. The writer declares that his lordship has simply been made to serve the purpose of party wire-pullers, whose chief desire in getting him to accept the mayoralty a third time has been to thereby keep out of office a member of the Council whose claims could not otherwise have been decently overlooked, but who happens to be a Liberal. Lord Warwick himself was doubtless quite in ignorance of this.

One of the elective auditors at Manchester, Mr. Norbury Williams, has just published an account of what appears to be an exceedingly serious municipal scandal. During the past few years a vast expenditure has been incurred by the city in the construction of new main sewers, and the work has been placed by the Corporation in the hands of a number of contractors. The contracts were for the construction of sewers two bricks in thickness, but it has now been discovered that certain lengths of the sewers are only one brick thick, and that the work was otherwise "scamped." The sewers were built in tunnels, and it is alleged that warning was given to the contractor's workmen whenever the Corporation clerk of the works descended the shaft to the tunnel, and that for the deception of this official the bricklayers at once put a double ring of bricks on the part of the structure which was exposed to his view. There is said to be some inclination to hush up the scandal by referring the question between the Corporation and the contractors to arbitration. If, however, the facts are correctly represented, it is not at all a matter for arbitration, but one in which legal proceedings ought to be instituted against the guilty parties.

There was a somewhat acrimonious discussion at the meeting of the Portsmouth Town Council last week on the subject of free railway passes. Some time ago it was asserted that Alderman Abraham L. Emanuel had applied to the companies for free passes to London for deputations from the Improvement Committee of which he is chairman, and he explained through the local papers that this had only been done on two or three occasions. Last week Dr. Emmett asked certain plain questions, one being whether there were really but two or three occasions on which such passes had been received by deputations, and another whether Alderman Emanuel himself always paid the usual fares when travelling by the London and South-Western line. The Alderman in his reply waxed exceeding wrath with the gentleman who brought the matter forward, but he failed to give the desired information. At the risk of myself incurring the worthy Alderman's anger, I would suggest to him that this was a very unfortunate omission, and that he would do well to publicly answer the questions which were publicly put to him, or unfavourable conclusions may be drawn from his silence.

The Blaby Guardians cannot be congratulated upon the manner in which they have disposed of the complaints against the medical officer which, as I mentioned the other week, were formulated in a recent report of the House Committee. The doctor's reply was received and considered at the last meeting, with the result that the Board passed a resolution "expressing regret at his conduct in neglecting to attend the sick inmates of the workhouse in a more satisfactory manner." This is not a proper way of ending the matter, either from the point of view of the Board or from that of the officer concerned. If the charges of laxity and remissness in his duty which were made against him were not well founded, it was the duty of the Guardians to admit the fact. On the other hand, if the complaints were borne out on investigation, something more than a mere expression of "regret" was required from the Board.

At the meeting of the Elham Guardians the other day it was proposed that in future sick persons, on being admitted to the workhouse, should be taken direct to the infirmary, instead of being first detained in the receiving-ward. No reasonable objection could be urged against this change, which was suggested in consequence of two Guardians having happened to see a man almost in a dying condition ordered to the receiving-ward, where, but for their interference, he would probably have remained for some time. But certain of the Elham Guardians, mostly representing rural districts of the Union, make a point of opposing every reform, and, on a show of hands being taken, this proposal was declared to be lost. The mover, Mr. J. Jones, then demanded that the names of those voting each way should be recorded in the minutes, whereupon the opposition suddenly collapsed, and the proposal was carried. The opposing members, it would seem, were willing to defeat a humane and desirable proposal so long as there was no risk of their votes being called up in judgment against them, but not otherwise. A nice set of Bumbles they must be!

The important and lucrative office of Sheriff Clerk of Lanarkshire has been given by Lord Balfour of Burleigh to Mr. John Downie, a well-known Glasgow "writer," who has been for several years one of the leading Tory election agents in the West of Scotland, and rendered valuable assistance both to the present Lord Advocate and to his predecessor in the representation of Buteshire. This appointment has been received with vituperative yelpings by the Liberal Unionists in the north, who are furious at finding men of their own party systematically put aside by Lord Balfour in favour of Tories of his own particular persuasion. There is now much more bitterness between "Parliament House" Tories and Liberal Unionists than there has ever been within the memory of man between Tories and Liberals.

An anonymous solicitor writes me a somewhat singular letter on the subject of debt-collector's charges. He begins by telling me that he has not much time for writing to papers, or he would have written me long ago. He regrets to write anonymously, but nevertheless does it. At the end of two folios of MS. he tells me that if he had known how long his letter would have been he would never have begun it. And after all that, he stops to tell me in a P.S. that, on looking over what he has written, he thinks he might have done the subject more justice had he devoted more time to it. I think this is highly probable; and if my esteemed correspondent will wait till he has more time, and if he will, when putting his mature reflections into shape, pay me the compliment of trusting me with the important secret of his identity, as is required of all other newspaper correspondents, I shall be pleased to give him every attention. If I have to wait a few years before hearing from him again, I will bear up in the interval with such fortitude as I can command. Pending this further communication, I have only to say that my opinion about debt-collectors' charges remains unchanged.

A recent decision of the West Riding Bench at Pontefract in regard to a summons against the Rev. Bernard Speet, of Hemsworth, for cruelty to a dog, has excited much unfavourable comment in the district. It appeared that a policeman noticed a dog being dragged along the road beneath defendant's trap, to which it had been tied. The dog was dead, and all the hair had been rubbed off one of its sides; but, though the policeman called the defendant's attention to the fact, he drove on without saying anything. In defence it was stated that the dog was "all right" when it was first fastened to the trap, and that the cruelty was not intentional. Accepting this plea, the magistrates dismissed the charge. It seems to me that their worships took an unduly charitable and merciful view of the matter. For my own part, I should consider the fact of a man having tied a dog under his trap in this way as in itself primâ-facie evidence of cruelty, and most decidedly I should not be inclined to acquit anybody who persisted in driving on regardless of whether the animal was killed or not.

The London Hospital, E., Appeals for Subscriptions. This Hospital for Men, Women, and Children, is the great General Hospital for the toiling poor of East London, & help is sorely needed

A lad named Seaman was recently fined £5 by Mr. Hopkins at Lambeth Police-court under circumstances which seem to call for very strong comment. Seaman, who is seventeen years of age, is a "property" boy attached to an entertainment called "Sedgwick's Ghost Illusion." One night a few weeks ago he inadvertently took away from the performance in his pocket a dummy revolver used in the performance. He happened to be showing this article to a friend in the Kennington-road, when he was "spotted" by an active and intelligent constable, who, finding on inquiry that he had no licence, reported the matter to the Inland Revenue authorities, who in due course summoned Seaman at the police-court. The manager of the show was present in the court to explain the circumstances, but without hearing him, and apparently without going into the merits of the case at all, Mr. Hopkins imposed this monstrous fine of £5 on a boy earning 10s. a week. A more monstrous sentence I have never heard of; for even if the law is in such a state of muddle that it requires a licence for carrying a dummy revolver which will not fire, the least that could be required under such circumstances would be a nominal penalty. It seems almost impossible that a stipendiary magistrate would pass such a sentence except under a complete misapprehension of the facts, and I hope that it is not yet too late for such a miscarriage of justice to be put right.

At Milnthorpe Police-court last week Sir Henry Bromley and his two sons, of Dallam Tower, were summoned at the instance of the Inland Revenue Department for using a gun without a licence. It was reported, however, that the defendants' cases "had been explained to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who had accepted their explanations and a substantial fine;" and the Bench thereupon allowed the summonses to be withdrawn. If the offence was one calling for "a substantial fine," surely it ought to have been dealt with in the ordinary way by the magistrates; but in these matters there is evidently one law for the rich and another for the poor. Three working men who similarly offended would find any "explanations" to the Commissioners unavailing; they would have to make their defence in the police-court, and face the consequences of the publicity from which the authorities have attempted to shield Sir Henry Bromley and his sons.

In a recent Game Law case at Woodbridge Petty Sessions, one Noah Fisk was fined a shilling and ordered to pay the costs for killing a rabbit on some common land. The fine itself was moderate enough, but the costs with which the defendant was saddled came to no less than three guineas, so that the total penalty was altogether out of proportion to the offence. That the costs in such a prosecution at Petty Sessions should be piled up against the defendant in this extravagant fashion is a monstrous injustice, and I have an impression that the Home Secretary some three or four years ago issued a circular to magistrates condemning the practice. Clearly it would be well for Sir Matthew White Ridley to address another remonstrance to the Woodbridge Bench.

Pigeon-shooting is at the best a cruel (so-called) sport, but never have I heard of its being practised with such wanton inhumanity as in the case from Bradford which is recorded in my Legal Pillory this week, and most people will probably agree with me that if the Tong District Councillor and his companions had been given a short spell of imprisonment without the option of a fine they would have met with no more than their deserts. The other cases in the following list are mostly of a familiar type, and nobody can miss the significance of the contrast between the penalties for offences against the person and those for other and less heinous offences. I would, however, specially call attention to the sentences at Amersham and at Samford as illustrations of the harsh and vindictive spirit in which the county magistracy administer the Game Laws :—

Nottingham Police-court. Before Mr. W. Allen and Dr. Littlewood. Alfred Ordoyno, charged with being drunk and disorderly, and with assaulting a policeman. Prisoner was thrashing a woman in the street, and on being arrested he violently assaulted the constable, kicking him in the face, and breaking his nose. Fined 20s. for the two offences.

Bradford West Riding Police-court. Before Mr. T. Peel and other magistrates. Isaac Foster (a Tong District Councillor), his son, Cain Foster, and Albert Senior, charged with cruelty to two pigeons. The pigeons were released from a trap with their legs tied to a piece of string, so that they could not escape, and bits of earth and stone were thrown to induce the birds to rise. Isaac Foster fired a gun and wounded the first bird, which was thereupon pulled back and replaced in the trap, after which Senior had a shot at it. The same performance was gone through with the second bird, and then a constable interfered. Fined 40s. each and costs, or one month.

Doncaster Borough Police-court. Thomas Cole, charged with cruelty to a horse by working it while in an unfit state. The animal was in a shocking condition, and a police witness said that he had never seen a worse case. Fined 2s. 6d. including costs.

Bury Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. Meadowcroft and Byrom. Henry Mitchinson, charged with assaulting his wife on October 11 and 13. On the first date he thumped her in the face; on the second he knocked her down and struck and kicked her in a most brutal manner. A surgeon said the woman came to him partly covered with blood and suffering very great pain. She was extensively bruised about the right side of the face, her lips were cut, her arm and shoulder injured, and one of her ribs was partially broken. The Bench fined defendant 10s. 6d. for each assault, afterwards granting a separation order.

Needham Market Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. R. H. Tidswell, S. T. Harwood, S. A. Maw, General Phillipps, and General Martin. Arthur Garrod pleaded guilty to a charge of poaching. Two months and a further six months in default of finding sureties.

Amersham Police-court. Before Captain T. H. T. Drake and Mr. G. Weller. Arthur Wilson pleaded guilty to a charge of poaching, namely, taking a pheasant by night on land belonging to Earl Howe. The offence was committed on December 24, 1894, and defendant had now given himself up to the police, saying that "the affair" had been a great trouble to him, that he was at present in a good situation at Manchester, and that he would like to have the case settled. Fined £5 and 11s. 6d. costs.

Dunfermline Sheriff-court. Before Sheriff Gillespie. Andrew Anderson and John Matthewson, charged under the Poaching Prevention Act with being found on the highway with one partridge and some nets in their possession. Fined £2. 5s. 9d. each, or fourteen days.

Samford Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. C. H. Berners, A. M. Bernard, T. S. Furniss, W. A. Elliston, Rev. J. H. Hocking, and General H. D. Phillipps. George Chaplin, William Hill, and Mark Salter, charged with poaching. The Deputy Chief Constable asked the magistrates to take into consideration that the prisoners used no violence, and, unlike gangs of poachers generally, had no stones in their pockets. Three months each (the maximum penalty for a first offence) and a further six months in default of finding sureties for their good behaviour for the ensuing twelve months.

Burnley County Police-court. Before Messrs. J. Baron and T. Thornber. John Lord, charged with an aggravated assault on his wife. The woman had separated from defendant owing to his ill-treatment. He went to the house where she was living, struck her on the breast, and kicked her on the legs with his clogs, severely hurting her. Fined 20s. and costs.

Pontypridd Police-court. Before Mr. T. P. Jenkins and other magistrates. Thomas Thomas and Richard Sims, convicted of assaulting a man named Burns. Prosecutor was struck on the ear, knocked down, and kicked in the eye, becoming unconscious, and losing a considerable quantity of blood. A doctor said Burns had a jagged wound on the left temple, 2 in. long and extending to the bone, and there were abrasions on the left ear and the back of the head. Fined £3 each.

Torquay Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor, Messrs. R. A. Clark, W. H. Lord, W. B. Smale, and W. Ball. Henry Sampson, charged with vagrancy by sleeping in an unoccupied house. Seven days.

Aylesbury Petty Sessions. Before Captain Terry and other Justices. William Saving, labourer, charged with stealing six hen's eggs. There was a previous conviction, but prosecutor did not wish to press the present charge. Six weeks.

Totnes County Petty Sessions. Before Captain Conran and other Justices. Hugh Pearse, charged with sleeping out, and being without visible means of subsistence. Fourteen days.

Persons receiving communications from a Mr. Oscar Bartley, offering to obtain situations for them, whether in response to newspaper advertisements or otherwise, will do well to give him a very wide berth. This Bartley's game appears to be to answer advertisements, or to advertise on his own account offers of various situations which he states he is commissioned to fill up on receipt of a small fee by way of bonus for the introduction. In one letter which I have before me, written a few weeks back from 66, Devonshire-road, Mare-street, Hackney, Bartley states that he is commissioned to appoint a cook-housekeeper to a well-known gentleman in London, whose business he transacts, and he offers to bestow this valuable appointment for the modest sum of 5s., which, I am glad to say, he did not get in this instance. It is a simple, and, one would think, a transparent trick, but apparently Bartley is doing very well with it. He was at 66, Devonshire-road for two or three weeks, and received at that address a large amount of correspondence, of which a considerable proportion may be presumed to have contained remittances. He then removed to Omega House, Winchilsea-road, Tottenham, where he again received an extensive correspondence; and, doubtless, when parties who have paid him money become unduly pressing, he will remove to another address. If anybody who has been defrauded by this rascal would put the police on his track they ought to have no difficulty in catching him.

A trick essentially the same has lately been carried on by an advertisement which appeared in the Daily Chronicle and other papers, asking for a man at 35s. a week. This advertisement being answered, the following communication was received :—

328, High Holborn, W.C.

Sir,—Your references are satisfactory. You are accepted on condition that you send me a security, say one or two pounds. On receipt of same I will forward you on full particulars.—Yours truly, L. Young.

It would seem almost incredible that anybody could be such a fool as to send one or two pounds in answer to such a letter, but I fear there can be no doubt that money has been obtained by this simple trick, for on inquiring at 328, High Holborn, I find that L. Young has already disappeared. It seems that a room, or, more strictly speaking, a cupboard, at the top of the house, was taken in that name for one week only. A young woman attended there daily, once or twice accompanied by a man, and at the end of the week the tenant departed. The handwriting of the above letter is almost indistinguishable from that of my old friend Stockham, the bogus house agent of Chancery-lane, but whether any conclusion is to be drawn from the resemblance I am unable to say.

There is a turf tout carrying on business at 28, Clapham Park-road, under the name of "W. Eustace." He begins his circular:—

Dear Sir,—This week your name, with two or three others, was incidentally mentioned to me with a recommendation to do you what good I could. I venture to suggest that you should place yourself on my private list, &c.

It would seem, however, that after the name had been given him, "W. Eustace" has entirely forgotten it, as well as the address. He has consequently been reduced to putting numerous copies of his communication into envelopes, addressed simply to "The Footman," and dropping them broadcast into the letter-boxes of houses in the neighbourhood of Eaton-square. Seriously, a man must be in the hope of dealing with an exceptional class of idiots when he can give himself away by beginning his circular with an obvious lie. In the course of the same document "W. Eustace" remarks, "For obvious reasons I do not advertise." For obvious reasons I think it better to give him this little advertisement gratis.

The man "Henry Miller"—a false name, of course—who did such a good business lately with his "Perfection System" of turf investment, is now under remand on a charge under the Betting Acts. There seems no reason why the indictment should be limited to this charge, and I would strongly recommend all those who have reason to complain of their dealings with Miller to place their cases without delay in the hands of the City Commissioner of Police, who is to be found at 26, Old Jewry, E.C.

In proof of what I said the other day as to the way in which Miller lured his victims on to their destruction, I may cite the experience of a gentleman in Berkshire. This misguided individual first invested £20 in the "Perfection System," and the "Perfection System" worked so perfectly that in the course of a few weeks the investor received regular weekly payments to the total amount of £15. 13s. At this point, like so many others who put their trust and cash in the "Perfection System," he was induced to entrust another £20 to Miller for investment. On this he received one weekly dividend of £1. 13. 6d., when the announcement came that the "Perfection System" had suddenly and unexpectedly gone wrong. Miller therefore netted £22. 13s. 6d. from this client alone. Well might he extol the virtues of the "Perfection System."

The luxury of a bath is incomplete without the addition of Scrubb's Cloudy Household Ammonia, which refreshes and exhilarates.

I have been making some further inquiries respecting the gang "Linton, McKenzie, Dyer, & Co.," who have been making free with the names of Truth and other papers on a circular inviting the public to subscribe money for working a patent system at Monte Carlo. The result of my inquiries is highly interesting. On several recent occasions, notably in Truth of October 1 and 8, my friend, Moses Moss, has dealt in his letter with a gang of Stock Exchange syndicate touts issuing circulars from 70 and 71, Bishopsgate-street, in the name of "Frank Tarrant & Co." Some of my readers may remember that the last operation of these individuals took the form of a circular, in which they alleged that they had closed a Metropolitan District deal at a profit of 587½ per cent. The "office" occupied by these people at 70 and 71, Bishopsgate-street turns out to be a small room at the top of the building, generally locked up, except at such times as "Tarrant & Co." call in search of letters from lunatics desirous of sharing in the next 587½ per cent. investment.

With tolerable certainty I can now say that Linton, McKenzie, Dyer, & Co., of 4, Adelaide-street, Charing Cross, are the same gang as Frank Tarrant & Co., of Bishopsgate-street. The "office" at 4, Adelaide-street is very similar to that at 70 and 71, Bishopsgate-street. It is a room which was taken at the end of September, and a month's rent was paid in advance in lieu of references. Linton, McKenzie, Dyer, & Co. put in no furniture, and apparently only use the place as an address for receiving letters. I am sorry to add that letters are reported to come in freely, many of them being registered, a fact which tells its own tale. To any rational being who looks at the circulars in which the public is invited to subscribe either to Tarrant & Co.'s 587½ per cent. investments, or Linton, Dyer, & Co.'s infallible Monte Carlo gambling system, which can never fail to yield a 15 per cent. profit, it must appear simply inconceivable that sufficient fools can be found to keep such rascals alive and busy.

A warning was given in last week's Truth against advertisements issued by an individual describing himself as "agent for Feakes & Co.," London, N.E. By an accident, which I much regret, the name of this "agent for Feakes & Co." was given in the paragraph as Berryman. The only person of that name known to me is a highly respectable gentleman, and is certainly not to be found anywhere near London Fields. The party to whom my paragraph referred is to be found at 8, Trederwen-road, London Fields, and anybody inquiring at that address for "W. G. Feakes" will probably have no difficulty in discovering him.

Many ingenious reasons for their poverty are put forward by the writers of begging-letters, but I think the palm among them all must be awarded to the following. The writer signs himself Charles Leicester, and addressed his letter, some two or three weeks ago, to the secretary of a Pall Mall club from 42, Norman-road, St. Leonard's-on-Sea :—

I am the only surviving son of the late Rev. Chas. Leicester, J.P., who was first cousin to the Right Honourable Lord De Tatley, member of your Club. Through the recent death of the third lord without issue, the peerage becomes extinct, and the entail cut off. I am left entirely without any friends or relatives to aid.

Then comes the usual harrowing tale of distress, concluding with a request to take tickets in a raffle for certain small pictures, valued at from one to two guineas apiece. The true reason for the poverty of this distinguished scion of the aristocracy is somewhat different from that assigned in his letter. A few years back he was employed as a sorter in the Post Office at Bath, at a salary of £72 a year, which he forfeited in the usual course, on being convicted and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment for stealing letters. When he had served his time he took to writing begging-letters from Brighton. (This, I may mention in parenthesis, was not his first effort in that line, he having practised begging-letter writing as far back as 1877, when he was living at Ryde, and had not yet entered the service of the Post Office). From Brighton he went to Hastings, where he had an engagement as a commercial traveller. This again terminated on his being convicted for embezzlement and getting another term of imprisonment. Since that he has lived exclusively by begging-letter writing. He encloses in his letter some particulars of the genealogy of the Leicester family, which, although in his own handwriting, he marks "Official Copy." Distinguished though his lineage may be, I cannot help thinking that a prison is the position in life which he is best fitted to adorn.

Some inquiries are being held by a Government Commission in Ireland regarding the working of various Loan Fund Societies. These societies were established under an Act of Parliament, and are ostensibly conducted on purely benevolent lines for affording temporary financial assistance to poor persons; but from the disclosures that have been made it would appear that some of them are little or no better than the ordinary usury shop. At Enniscorthy, for example, the Commissioners discovered that many borrowers had practically been charged for their loans at the rate of 50 per cent., and out of the profits thus acquired salaries were paid to officials and grants of money to the amount of £1,740 have been made to various local institutions. It is clear from this and similar cases that radical reforms are required in the management of these societies.

Before it is too late, I hope that some one will represent to the Central London Railway Company the inconvenience which may be caused by their giving the name of "Westbourne Station" to the station which they are now constructing in the Bayswater-road between Queen's-road and the Marble Arch. The name "Westbourne" is one of the most misleading geographical expressions in London, and straggles over a district two or three miles in diameter, beginning at the corner of Westbourne-street, Hyde Park, and extending to Westbourne Park Station and the confines of Kensal Town. To most Londoners the name "Westbourne" is chiefly associated with Westbourne-grove, but the station on the new line for Westbourne-grove will be the one at the corner of Queen's-road, and anybody going to the proposed "Westbourne Station" in search, say, of Mr. William Whiteley, would find himself or herself with at least a mile and a half to walk. The most accurate name for the station in question would be "Lancaster-gate."

What a strange infatuation it is which leads people to make public exhibitions of themselves by attempting to predict the incalculable vagaries of our climate! Some weeks back I cut out of a contemporary as a matter of curiosity a prediction of the weather for October, volunteered by a Mr. Hugh Clements. With all the cock-sureness of his class, Mr. Clements predicted :—

October will be on the whole a fine month. There will only be isolated showers during the first fourteen, and last nine days. The great feature of the month will be a very unsettled period from the 14th to 21st, with rain and wind of considerable force on the 19th and 20th. The maximum temperature will oscillate from a few degrees above 60 degs. to a few degrees below, &c., &c.

There is hardly a point in this prophecy which has not already been falsified by the result, and not one of the extraordinary features of the last three weeks' weather—the incessant rain, the almost unprecedented series of gales, and the cold snap on the 11th and 12th, when snow actually drifted an inch deep in Cornwall—has been foreseen by this prophet. Doubtless, however, Mr. Hugh Clements will be quite ready to predict the weather for November with equal confidence, and if he is not, somebody else will be.

Apart from the general inconvenience and discomfort to the public, it is amusing to watch the high-handed equanimity of the parochial authorities in the matter of the re-paving of Piccadilly. Neither Press notices nor indignation meetings have the slightest effect in expediting the work, which threatens, like the brook, to go on for ever; meanwhile it puzzles the ingenuity of the 'cutest West-ender to forecast the correct corner at which to drop on any given line of omnibuses, and reduces both the country-cousin and the intelligent foreigner to a state of absolute imbecility in their frantic efforts in this direction. We are undeniably a long-suffering people, but the resignation of the injured shopkeepers in this usually bustling thoroughfare, and the patient way in which they watch the Penelope-like proceedings of the operators, is really beyond all praise.

It will probably at first startle the Liberty and Property Defence League to hear that a wholesale abrogation of private rights in the ownership of land has just taken place under the sanction of the British Government. But no doubt Lord Wemyss and his friends will be reassured when I add that the owners in question are only black men—for that fact makes, of course, a vast difference to the justice and morality of the proceeding. This revolutionary measure has been carried out on the Gold Coast, by the promulgation of an ordinance which sets forth that no private title to land will in future be recognised as valid by the Gold Coast Government, unless such land was acquired through a Government office. According to a correspondent who has lately returned home from the colony, the effect of the enactment is to wipe out all private ownership, and to convert every rood of land in the country into the property of the Crown; and this notwithstanding the fact that private owners may for years have had their titles registered and confirmed in the local courts of the colony. Thus, if A wishes to purchase land occupied by B, a native, which for generations has been recognised as the property of B's family, A, instead of going to B, must now apply to the Gold Coast Government for the land. If my correspondent's interpretation of the new enactment is correct, it is pretty certain to give rise to the trouble and discontent which he predicts. The native's untutored mind does not grasp the idea that the colour of his skin justifies the confiscation of his property.

How easily people are fooled who wish to be fooled, and how very credulous is the Unionist Press! On Sunday a letter appeared in the Observer, purporting to be from Sir William Harcourt, expressing his deep love and affection for Lord Rosebery, and his regret that the Liberal Party had lost so able a Leader. The question why Sir William should have confided these regrets to a mysterious stranger, who wrote to him from Clapton, seems to have occurred to no Unionist Editor. On Monday morning they all published the letter, and made it the text for articles, in which Sir William was roughly handled, and the Liberals were called upon to revert to their allegiance to the candidate of the Unionists for the Liberal Leadership. In the evening of the same day it became known that the letter was a forgery. What next trick will the Unionist Press play in order to impose on us their candidate for our Leadership?

I wonder if any one believes all that he reads in newspapers. I used to believe about one-tenth, but each day I reduce my percentage of belief. There are, of course, Party organs that lie designedly. Generally the newspaper lie is merely an effort to be first in the field of sensation. Some newspaper reporter either abroad or at home is told an "undoubted fact" by one of those models of credulity that frequent coffee or pot houses. He at once telegraphs it to the newspaper or the Press Agency with which he is connected. It is published on the chance of its being true. Other newspapers repeat the information in order not to be behind-hand in the dissemination of news, and their leading-article writers, in want of a subject for their facile pens, indite the next day articles on it. The day following the lie is contradicted, and is replaced by another, which runs the same course. "Give us each day our daily lie" is, I take it, the prayer of most newspapers, for to them a daily lie is as necessary as daily bread is to their readers. Speaking broadly, in regard to these newspaper lies, a more thorough one may be purchased for a halfpenny than for a penny.

If foreigners—as I am afraid that they do—judge us by our Jingo newspapers, they must come to the conclusion that a more despicable set of cowardly braggarts does not exist on the globe. A little while ago the Bobadils of the Press were angry with France, and they were all for an alliance with Germany. Then Germany angered them, and after renouncing all things German, they suggested to France that she ought to be our ally. Just now, as France and Russia seem to be the dominant factors on the Continent, they are almost on their knees to Russia, imploring her to take us into her good graces. Less than a year ago they were breathing fire and fury against the United States in respect to Venezuela, and vowing that rather than arbitrate as to the title of certain lands on which some English had squatted, and which Venezuela claimed, we would go to war with the Americans. Now it would seem, according to Sir Edward Clarke, that these lands really do belong to Venezuela, and he advises the country at once to assent to an arbitration, which he admits would go against us, rather than be forced to do this by the United States.

In the meantime, Mr. Curzon informs us that we are at present not going beyond Dongola in the Soudan, but that we intend to conquer the whole of that country by piecemeal, an advance each year being dependent on the amount that we can screw out of the Egyptians for the purpose. Never, he says, can we leave Egypt until the entire Soudan is conquered; although how far the territory going by that name extends southwards or eastwards, neither he, nor any one else can say. But when conquered, who is to administer it? The Egyptians, I apprehend. We, however, insist that the Egyptians cannot administer their own country without our aid. To conquer, therefore, the Soudan, and to educate the Egyptians into administering it, as well as their own country, will, I should fancy, take, on a moderate estimate, fifty years.

With this future before us, the following extract from a dispatch of M. Waddington to his Government, giving words used to him by Lord Salisbury, November 3, 1886, is interesting:—

> Those are greatly mistaken amongst you who think that we want indefinitely to remain in Egypt. We seek the means honestly to withdraw. The troops that we have there would be more useful in India. This is the opinion of our best Generals.

According to the pro-Turkish newspapers, the agitation on behalf of the Armenians is dying out. In this estimate I do not agree, and the demonstration at St. James's Hall ought to dispose of it. The feeling that we cannot, consistently with our honour and good name, condone such iniquities as have been practised by our ally, the Sultan, is as strong as ever. All are beginning to recognise that, whilst we might do more harm than good by isolated action, we cannot allow our "Statesmen" to make the integrity of the Turkish Empire our concern, but that we must be prepared to leave a free hand to Russia, provided that she will take upon herself the duty of coercing the Sultan into humanity, even though the result should be her political leadership on the Bosphorus.

I have always said that we have only two alternatives: either to recognise this Russian hegemony, which is the necessary outcome of Russia's geographical position, or to let the Sultan have his own sweet will in his mode of governing the subject races in his dominions. All else is mere intrigue. What is the use of prating about a European concert when that concert has been proved merely to be one of doing nothing? The Turk will, I make no doubt, promise reforms; he will publish them but they will remain a dead letter. He only knows one argument—the stick. The only concert possible is an agreement that Russia shall be invested with this stick. To this France and Germany consent, and Austria is not in a position to dissent. We, and we alone, whilst professing the noblest and most generous sentiments, are intriguing to hinder it. Nothing is so long-lived as a traditional policy. For nearly a century we have made it our mission to bolster up the vilest Government that ever existed, because we regard its existence as necessary to our interests. That this is to our interests is taken for granted, although why it is has never been explained. Interest or no interest, however, the country is slowly coming to the conclusion that this subordination of humanity and right-doing to traditional policy must cease.

We are often told that Austria would never agree to the Dardanelles being practically in the hands of Russia, because this would possibly interfere with the free passage of her commerce viâ the Danube to the open sea. As a matter of fact, there is no such commerce. Why should Austria send goods down the Danube, through the Black Sea, to the Mediterranean? What would be the destination of such commerce? Whatever goods Austria and Hungary do send for shipment to foreign parts go by way of the Adriatic, reaching the ports of exit by railroad. Very possibly she would not be averse from becoming possessed of Salonica in the event of territorial changes in the Balkan peninsula, and, if so, what is the objection to her having Salonica? Austria has always been ready to be bought. Any latent opposition to Russian action in Turkey merely means that if there be such action she would expect some rectification of her Eastern frontier. Why not? Shall we be told that the interests of the British Empire forbid our assent?

The following is an extract from a letter which a gentleman at Constantinople has addressed to his English correspondents. It is of interest as showing the view which is taken of the situation by a competent and trustworthy observer on the spot, who is dealing mainly with the commercial and financial outlook:—

. . . All business is at a standstill, and the whole community depressed by a feeling of disheartenment and hopelessness. Already many shops (besides those owned by Armenians) have closed their shutters sooner than increase the load of debt which is weighing their properties down. The more wealthy members of the population are either preparing to leave the country or are living on their capital and waiting events. The business of the Banks is nil, and even the Administration of the Public Debt has announced that as a measure of economy the posts vacated by the resignation of the Armenian employees will not be filled up. The Government resources are completely exhausted, the Treasury empty, the taxes in great part unpaid, the Army has received no money for months, and even the Diplomatic salaries, which up to now have always been received punctually, have not been settled since last November. The Government must obtain money for the food of the Army, if for nothing else, and, putting aside the idea of another loan as impossible under the existing circumstances, funds can only be obtained by laying hands on the revenues ceded to the Public Debt and the guaranteed railways.

In a word, the position is hopeless in every way, the Government bankrupt beyond redemption, all security for life and property lost, business of every kind at a complete standstill, credit impossible, whilst the working power of the country has been weakened by the loss of some 30,000 Armenians (killed, imprisoned, and deported) who formed the most important and trustworthy part of the labouring class of the population.

The question follows: Can this state of things be allowed to continue and to grow worse from day to day? If not, how can it be remedied? The reply to this is simple. It can be remedied by a radical change in the Government, and this can only be effected either by the expulsion of the Turks and the assumption of power by a Christian people, or by a change of Sultan and an adequate European control supported by force. No half measures will be of any use, no promised reforms will restore confidence, no good laws (on paper) can give the security of life and property which is all that is wanted to turn this (at present) hopelessly bankrupt country into the richest and most prosperous in the world, in which hundreds of millions of European capital can be profitably employed and hundreds of thousands of the surplus population of Western Europe find lucrative work. . . . It is to be hoped that those who have influence with Lord Salisbury's Government will employ it in the endeavours to induce our Ministers to come to an agreement with Russia and France by which, mutual sacrifices being made, a good and stable Government under European control may be given to Turkey.

Is it not about time that public opinion should express itself on what seems to be going on in Matabeleland? Every week a telegram comes to say that the war is over, but the next day we hear of kraals being shelled or burnt. I presume that there are women and children as well as men in them, and that all indiscriminately are killed. Then we are told of women and cattle being taken prisoners. The idea of laying hands on the women and children of an enemy in order to force him into surrender is even more abominable than this shelling. If a "rebel" is executed, and the Imperial authorities object, at once the gold-seeking scum of Bulawayo utter loud protests against the objection. So far as I can understand what is transpiring, there is a deliberate attempt being made to kill off the Matabele, as though they were vermin, or to drive them out of the land, in order that prospectors may have an opportunity of wandering about in search of traces of gold on which to base some rotten Company by means of which investors at home are to be cozened out of their money.

"Rebels thanked Rhodes and Colenbrander profusely," says one of last week's telegrams from Bulawayo. Thanked them for what? Apparently for tricking them out of their country and independence, massacring them by hundreds with machine guns, robbing them of whatever they possessed worth stealing, driving them into revolt from sheer despair, and finally subduing them after a bloody war. If the "rebels" had anything else to thank Rhodes for profusely it is that, after finally subduing them, he has deigned to leave some of them alive. This thankfulness for small mercies may be touching, but it scarcly redounds so much to the credit of Rhodes as to be worth telegraphing to the London

SCRUTATOR.

OUR ONLY LEADER.

"DE mortuis nil nisi bonum." But then your friend ought to be safely soldered in his coffin, or enclosed in a snuff-box after cremation. Neither is the case with Lord Rosebery, and I should be sincerely sorry were it so, for I regard him as a most interesting personality, whilst the loss of that post-prandial oratory in which he excels would diminish our sum of pleasures. His henchmen have seized the opportunity of his retirement to inaugurate a Rosebery boom, and according to them the best proof that he is the only person capable of leading the Liberal Party is that he admits that he cannot lead it. When I remember that Lord Rosebery has always played the game of nolo episcopari, it looks to me as though the present aim of his henchmen is to make confusion worse confounded, in order that he may be induced (reluctantly, and under protest)—to deign to come forward once more as the Liberal leader, but invested with dictatorial power to do precisely what he pleases, much as Napoleon was acclaimed Emperor by his Pretorians on his return from Elba. It is needless to say that the Tory Press and the Tory Statesmen are for this restoration. Mr. Curzon assures us that he commiserates with the Party that has lost such a Leader, and urges us to implore him on bended knees to condescend once more to lead us. The Times would have us keep the post of Leader open, and leave the selection to the Queen —that Leader being, of course, Lord Rosebery—if ever we are so fortunate as to secure a Parliamentary majority. I am not disposed to accept my Leader either from the Queen, or from Mr. Curzon, or from the Times; indeed, the clearest proof that a man ought not to be my Leader is when Queen, Curzon, and Times unite in recommending him. To the "dilly, dilly, come and be killed," that the old woman addressed to her ducks, I turn a very deaf ear; indeed, there is, I believe, no evidence that even the silly ducks accepted the advice thus tendered to them.

There is one point in this question of Leadership that it may be well to clear up. According to the myth which is being hatched by Lord Rosebery's friends and by his Tory allies, he never received fair play from his colleagues, and Mr. Asquith goes so far as to urge those of them who meted out to the ex-Leader scant justice to eschew in future all personal rivalries and jealousies. What, however, are the real facts? When it was first bruited about that Mr. Gladstone was likely to withdraw from public affairs, all supposed that he would be succeeded by Sir William Harcourt, who had for many years been his chief lieutenant, and who had, in that capacity, done yeoman's service to his Party. Not so, however, thought Lord Rosebery's henchmen in the House of Commons. They were few in number, in position obscure, and mostly Scotch. But their zeal made up for their numerical and personal insignificance. All their efforts, however, failed to convince, so absurd was the idea of Lord Rosebery supplanting Sir William Harcourt deemed by the vast majority of the Liberals in Parliament. But suddenly, several of Lord Rosebery's colleagues announced that they would not serve under Sir William. For this they did not allege any difference of political opinion between him and them, but they put their refusal on the ground which actuated the friend of Dr. Fell towards that sage. It may be reasonably supposed that, with some at least of these gentlemen, this revolt took place in connivance with the Court, for although it had been for long the invariable rule that the Queen consults the outgoing Premier as to his successor, in this case Mr. Gladstone's opinion was not asked. Lord Rosebery was summoned to Windsor, and before the Liberals had awakened to what was transpiring, he was already Prime Minister.

The position of Sir William Harcourt was undoubtedly a difficult one. He had declared that he held to the Liberal doctrine that the Premier ought to be in the House of Commons. But it was obvious that, had this doctrine been acted upon, he would have been Premier. Had he, consequently, refused to serve under Lord Rosebery, he would have been open to the accusation that he had been influenced by a sense of personal grievance. He, therefore, remained Leader in the Commons and Chancellor of the Exchequer. He could hardly, however, have been expected to give an enthusiastic support to Lord Rosebery's foreign policy, for in regard to our foreign relations he had always been in accord with Mr. Gladstone. Nor can he be regarded as responsible for the general domestic policy of the Ministry; yet it was Mr. Asquith, not he, who openly sneered at it, as ploughing the sands of the sea-shore. What Sir William thought of it he kept to himself, and officially defended it. But in his own department he effected that Democratic change in the incidents of taxation which was the one bright spot in the career of the Rosebery Cabinet. Then came the General Election. The Party, as a Party, had no policy, and no words of light and leading were vouchsafed to it. An assurance had been given by Lord Rosebery that a resolution against the Lords was to be the rallying cry, but no such resolution saw the light. The Liberal ship laboured in the sea, without a pilot and without a rudder, waterlogged and helpless; with the natural result that the election was a crushing defeat. The majority that had a few years ago supported a Gladstone Cabinet was converted into a pitiable minority when asked to support a Rosebery Cabinet.

When the new Parliament met, Sir William Harcourt led the Liberals in the Commons. The Conservative Government had a majority of 150. But with these odds against him, and with associates around him who had shown that they were not his cordial supporters, he led the Opposition with such ability that, at the end of the Session, the Unionist Government was, by the admission of their most ardent friends, thoroughly discredited. To say, therefore, that Lord Rosebery had not fair play, and to imply that the attitude of Sir William towards him was the reason why he proved a failure as Premier, is really a deliberate perversion of fact. If ever a man sacrificed all thought of self to Party loyalty, that man is Sir William Harcourt. I say this with absolute indifference of judgment, for I by no means agreed in his course of action. I held, and I still hold, that he ought to have had the civic courage to risk personal imputations, rather than to have sacrificed, to the risk of incurring them, his own views upon our foreign relations, and that sheet anchor of all Radical progress—the absolute necessity of a Liberal Premier being in the House of Commons, if that House is to rule.

I have entered into these details, not because I hold a brief for Sir William Harcourt, but because I have a strong sense of fair play alike to friend and foe. But the question lies not so much in the past as in the present. I really care very little personally who may be the Leader of the Liberal Party, provided that the Leader be a sound Radical, a man of resource and experience, and that he be prepared to maintain, if necessary, the supremacy of the House of Commons in the Executive. I am for Sir William Harcourt, simply because he fulfils the above conditions, and because he is the Leader in the Commons. My doctrine has always been this: the House of Commons ought to be the centre of political gravity; whoever leads the Liberals there, is de facto the Leader of the Liberal Party; and in the event of the Party obtaining a Parliamentary majority, he, and he alone, should be called upon to form an Administration. If objection be taken to the individual holding this position by any members of the Party, then they should ask for a Party meeting, and there openly submit their objections. Lord Tweedmouth, in a speech last week to the Liberals of Falkirk, "urged them to allow the question of Leadership to be settled by the prerogative of the Queen when the time arrives." When I read this I asked myself into what depths of degradation the Liberal Party will be dragged, if they allow their principles to be provided for them by Peers. That the Sovereign may select as Premier any Court flunkey whom she pleases is theoretically true. But in our Constitution, theory and practice are seldom identical. By selecting its Leader, a Party nominates its candidate for the Premiership, and this nomination is officially ratified by the Sovereign whenever the Party has a majority in the Commons. A monarch is necessarily a Conservative. As Joseph II. of Austria said, "My trade is to be a King." If the selection of the Premier were left to the Sovereign, he would select, whenever his choice has to be amongst Liberals, not the soundest Radical, and the man most likely to give effect to Radical aspirations, but the Liberal who is the nearest approach to a Conservative, and who may be most counted on for his courtly subserviency. Nor, indeed, should I blame the Sovereign were he to do this, for he would be right in his estimate that Radicals are such utter fools in leaving the selection of their Leader to him, that it would be almost criminal to place the destinies of a country in the hands of any one of them.

Mr. Asquith, as well as Lord Tweedmouth, counsel us to have neither Leader nor policy, but to let the future shape out the one and the other. My reply is that, so long as there is a Liberal Leader of the House of Commons, there is a Leader of the Party. But even if this were not so, such a counsel of weakness would perpetuate intrigue, and make any efficient leading of the Liberals in the Commons well-nigh impossible. I was first returned to Parliament above thirty years ago, and I should be a very idiot if I did not know something of its ways. I never had a very high estimate of human nature, and my frequentation of M.P.s has not led me to alter this estimate. I make allowance for the fact that the performance does not look the same from the auditorium as from behind the scenes, and that although from the latter the moon may be a lamp, the trees pasteboard, and the beautiful heroine a rouged and wrinkled matron, yet it does not follow that the general effect from the auditorium is not effective. But still I am bound to admit that M.P.s are not angelic beings above all human weaknesses, but that they have their full share of them. They have their ambitions, and they are given to pin themselves to the coat-tails of this man or that man, in the hopes that if he becomes the dispenser of the loaves and fishes, their advocacy of his claims to the Leadership may secure them a crumb or a sprat. So long as it is indefinite who the "dispenser" will be in the event of victory, principle takes a back seat, and Party is a mere name for back-stair intrigue, with the result that there is not that united action for a common end that alone can ensure victory. We may deplore that this should be, but the fact remains. It is the natural outcome of uncertainty. St. Paul, no mean authority on such matters, realised this, and he deprecated its fatal effect on the Early Church, when he adjured Christians not to say "I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas."

I never have been for blind subserviency to Party, nor have I ever been prepared to sacrifice my Radical principles on its altar. But I have always been ready to yield on many minor issues and on mere questions of tactics, in order to secure unity of action for a common end. Tactically, I recognise that a Leader is absolutely necessary in order that there may be unity. Sheep without a shepherd are apt to stray: indeed, the idea of a shepherd is involved in the idea of a flock. If you want to carry water, you must have a jug. Is it, I ask, likely that the electors will ever have confidence in the ability of the Liberal Party to conduct the affairs of the nation, if they are so divided amongst themselves that they cannot even decide on who is to be their Leader? That Lord Tweedmouth and Mr. Asquith should have suggested this interregnum as a notable scheme of political wisdom, is to me inexplicable, unless they are so wedded to the Leadership of Lord Rosebery that they prefer that there should be no flock to lead, rather than Lord Rosebery should not be its shepherd.

Extract from a Lecture on "Foods," by Dr. Andrew Wilson.—"The consumption of cocoa happily increases year by year. I say 'happily' because, as tea and coffee are not foods, while cocoa is a true food, any increase in the national nutrition means an increase in the national prosperity. Winter, besides, is close upon us, and I advise those who are susceptible to colds to fortify themselves against chill by attention to their food. The easiest way of effecting this end for many is to substitute cocoa (Epps's being the most nutritious) for tea."

As regards policy, a programme is simply the honest enunciation of the main aims and objects of a Party. An electoral programme is different. It deals—or it should deal—alone with the particular issue on which the next election is to turn. With respect to the first, I want to know what will remain to us if our wire-pullers have their way? Disestablishment is to be dropped. Temperance is to be dropped. Peace and economy are to be dropped. Irish Home Rule is to be dropped. Payment of members is to be dropped. Drastic action in regard to the House of Lords is to be dropped. These wire-pullers and office-seekers are like the Russian mother who threw child after child to the wolves in order to reach her goal. But what would Democracy gain by the Liberal car passing the winning-post first in the electoral race if there were nothing on it but a dozen grooms, undecided which of them is to be the coachman, and with all the Radical freight scattered along the roadway? In Mr. Gladstone's last speech in the House of Commons, he said that, no matter what majority a Liberal Ministry may have there, it is stalemated by the legislative power of the Lords. If this be correct, and most unquestionably it is correct, our programme for the next General Election should be the removal of the obstruction which blocks the way to all else. But in this case we must at once nail our colours to the mast and rally public opinion to our battle cry. I do not believe that we are likely to reverse the verdict of last year by mere criticism of our opponents. All Liberal victories have been won on a specific reform, and after lengthy agitation for that reform. For the Conservatives a mere campaign of criticism is all very well, for their creed is that all would be for the best in the best of worlds, if only Radicals would cease to trouble; and after a period of activity there often comes upon a nation a desire for rest, which is the Tories' opportunity.

If really there is such a divergency of opinion between the majority of the occupants of the Liberal front bench and the Radicals, that united action only becomes possible by the latter allowing themselves to be sold into bondage, then it is full time for them to take separate action, and in this case they would carry with them the bulk of what is now the Liberal Party in the electorate. I deprecate this step so long as it is not forced upon us. But there must be a clear understanding that the Party as now constituted must not be a mere political sham, without a leader and without a policy; only held together by the hope of wresting from their opponents the basket containing the loaves and fishes. If the result of reconstruction of Parties be that Democracy is to remain for years in the desert, I prefer this to a victory which is no victory, and which drags us back to the days when politics were a struggle between Whigs and Tories, each seeking office, and each united in a determination to cajole or bully the Democracy into subserviency. I do not, however, believe that such a reconstruction will be necessary, if only Radicals will be true to their principles, and will insist that the present Liberal Party shall be true to them. I do not conceal from myself that, underlying all these personal squabbles that have landed the Liberal Party in the mire, there has been a deliberate endeavour on the part of some Liberals to arrest the progress of Democracy, and to say to its advancing waves, "So far and no further." This proved successful for a brief period, owing to the supineness of Radicals. But if Liberals have backbone, the Liberal Party may still be made a serviceable instrument for Radical progress. We may possibly lose the support of a few Whigs, who still hang on to the Liberal skirts in the hope of personal advantage, and in the expectation of tricking us into supporting the hoary abuses which they regard as the bulwarks of all sound government. Let it be with them as it was with the Liberal Unionists, let them openly join the ranks of our opponents, and we shall gain by losing them.

I have never understood personal animosity in politics; on the other hand, I have never understood personal likes being allowed to have any influence. To acclaim a man a Leader because you like him, or to refuse to accept him because you dislike him, is as absurd as to make the question depend on the colour of a man's hair. I believe in Democracy—thorough, uncompromising Democracy. Therefore I do my best to ensure its triumph; but I am quite ready to admit that those who do not are as worthy of respect as those who do. This kindly feeling towards them will, however, never prevent me from—as Dr. Johnson terms it—"downing" them if I can; nor are my feelings altered towards them if, in their endeavour to down me and those who agree with me, they represent us as the most noxious of political vermin.

THE WAR OFFICE AND THE 4TH HUSSARS.

Seldom has any incident in connection with the Army produced more general and unanimous indignation than the War Office treatment of the recent scandals in the 4th Hussars. This I say on the evidence of letters addressed to me from all branches of the Service, from officers of all ranks, both on the active and retired lists, and from dozens of civilians, some personally connected with the Army, others looking at the affair as more or less disinterested spectators. If I do not publish any of these letters verbatim, I beg the writers to believe that it is not from any want of respect for them personally, still less of appreciation of their sentiments or language; but merely because I think, where there is practical unanimity on all sides on every aspect of the case, the repetition of the same opinions in the words of any number of different correspondents, tends as much to weaken as to strengthen the effect of the facts. Substantially I can sum up the opinions of nearly every one who has communicated with me on the subject by saying that from beginning to end they are agreed that the treatment of Mr. Hodge in the 4th Hussars was disgraceful to the regiment, and in a degree to the whole Army; that in both the Hodge and the Bruce cases the War Office has shown an express desire to conceal the truth and protect the wrong-doers; and that the effect of the two cases as they now stand is to destroy all confidence in the straightforwardness and good faith of the present rulers of the Army.

It is this last aspect of the matter which is now the matter of most public importance. Many of my correspondents dilate eloquently and pointedly upon the evils of bullying in the Service, the cruelty that has been in past times perpetrated in this shape, the necessity of stamping it out, if the Army—the Cavalry regiments more particularly—is to be considered a profession for gentlemen, and not a mere playground for the wealthy unemployed, or an easy path to social position for moneyed snobs. But on this much all parties are pretty well agreed. Even Lord Wolseley so far bows to the general opinion on this point as to season his pitiful apology for the bullying of Mr. Hodge out of the 4th Hussars with a pious declaration of his intention to "put down bullying with a strong hand." For the present, at least, the mere question of bullying is thrown into the shade by the revelation that has been afforded of War Office methods of dealing with Service scandals and abuses.

Look for a moment at what is beyond question and controversy in these two cases. 1. Mr. Hodge, on joining the 4th Hussars, is immediately informed, at the Officers' Mess, and in the most offensive terms, that if he is not in a position to keep hunters and racehorses he had no business to join the regiment. 2. From that moment a blackguardly persecution is directed against him, beginning with rough horse-play, proceeding to the destruction of his clothing and property, and culminating in his being dragged from his bed on two successive nights by four blackguards—probably half drunk—and forced through a horse-trough. 3. By these and other means, continued after the personal complaint of his father to the Adjutant, Mr. Hodge is driven into resignation. 4. Another cadet, Mr. Bruce, having been appointed in his place, the subalterns decide—apparently in deference to the personal sentiments of one of the youngest of their number—that he is not qualified to grace their select circle. Having done so they invite him to dinner, inform him that they have got rid of Hodge, and will get rid of him too if he joins, and recommend him to make a graceful exit now in preference to a disgraceful one later on. As a reason for this course they allege his inability to "go the pace of the regiment" on an allowance of £500 or £600 a year. 5. Undeterred by these threats, Mr. Bruce joins, and is subjected from the first to a sort of organised conspiracy to make life in the regiment impossible for him, stopping short only of personal violence. Having committed the two indiscretions, first, of swearing at an N.C.O. at Bisley, and, secondly, of going into the Sergeants' Mess on Boxing Night and drinking one glass of whiskey and soda, he is for the second offence brought before the General at the War Office, and, on the evidence of an N.C.O., directly traversed by his own statement, called upon to resign—this within nine months of joining.

All these facts, I say, are beyond controversy. They have been officially laid before the War Office for inquiry, and the War Office, while resorting to every artifice in order to minimise their significance, does not dispute one of them. As regards Mr. Hodge, the Secretary of State expressly admits that this gentleman was bullied by his brother officers. As regards Mr. Bruce, he does not deny the fact of the dinner, or the allegations as to what passed there. It is, therefore, admitted: (1) that Mr. Hodge was bullied into resignation by a systematic course of blackguardly cruelty and ruffianism, the equal of which has probably never before been recorded in the annals of the Army; (2) that, in spite of some sort of official reprimand, the same officers, having got rid of Mr. Hodge, at once formed an insubordinate conspiracy to get rid of his successor, and did their best to carry out their design, so far as was consistent with their own safety, until the Colonel of the regiment saved them further trouble by finding a pretext for making representations to the General which brought about the desired result. All this ng admitted, the War Office nevertheless thinks it "unnecessary to take further action" in regard to either case.

How is this monstrous conclusion justified? First, in the case of Mr. Hodge, by putting forward—without hearing him in his own defence, without even intimating to him or his friends that such imputations have been made against him—a vile slander, imputing to him cowardice in the riding-school and malingering; and by pronouncing him on the strength of this slander "constitutionally unfitted for a cavalry officer." No sooner are these allegations put forward than the first of them is conclusively disposed of by the evidence of Mr. Hodge's father, that a statement to the directly contrary effect had been made to him by the Adjutant of the regiment; while the charge of malingering is as forcibly answered by unimpeachable evidence that the lad's health was utterly broken down when he sent in his resignation. Further, the worthlessness of both allegations as an excuse for the treatment of Mr. Hodge is shown by the fact that the organised persecution was commenced within a day or two of his joining, and before he had had any opportunity of showing his "constitutional" fitness or unfitness. It is not too much to say that the publication of this slander in an official document, without an attempt to test its accuracy, and obviously on the evidence of the very parties whose conduct is impugned, is a proceeding grossly discreditable to "the Secretary of State and his military advisers," and in itself calculated to stamp their attitude as that, not of impartial judges, but of partisans. It is the more discreditable inasmuch as its introduction into the document is totally irrelevant and pointless. For the Commander-in-Chief cannot go the length of asserting that because the junior officers of a regiment find a man "constitutionally unfitted" for a commission they are justified in destroying his property and dragging him through a horse trough. His lordship has consequently in the next breath to admit that Mr. Hodge was bullied, and to pronounce the bullying inexcusable.

To justify himself for taking no further notice of this inexcusable bullying, the Commander-in-Chief then falls back on the plea that it was sufficiently punished at the time, and that the "drastic" measures then taken by the C.O. had the desired effect. In regard to this it is sufficient to repeat what has already been said in TRUTH, that these "drastic" measures were of such a nature that Mr. Hodge himself, though he remained in the regiment several weeks afterwards, never heard of them; that Mr. Bruce, his successor, never heard of them; that up to last June the War Office itself never heard of them; and that no living soul, beyond the parties immediately concerned and the writer of the War Office apologia, knows to this day what they were. If the War Office is so satisfied that exemplary punishment was awarded, let it inform the public what the punishment really was, and leave the public to decide whether it was "drastic" or not. That these "drastic" measures produced no result beyond the cessation of actual personal violence, is conclusively shown, first, by the fact that the persecution of Mr. Hodge was afterwards continued by other means until the desired result was produced; and, secondly, by the fact that, as soon as Mr. Hodge was got rid of, a similar conspiracy was organised against the gentleman appointed by the War Office in his place. And be it remembered that the first step taken by Mr. Bruce was to report to the Adjutant the whole facts respecting the ultimatum delivered to him, so that the authorities had, from the first, official notice of the deliberate intention of the subalterns to repeat towards Mr. Bruce the conduct by which they had got rid of Mr. Hodge. For the Commander-in-Chief to contend in the face of these facts that adequate and effectual punishment has been administered, and that the result shows that no further action is necessary, is an insult to the intelligence of the public, and on a par with his heroic declaration (while inventing excuses for winking at the most outrageous case of bullying ever brought to light) that he is determined to put down bullying with a strong hand wherever its existence is proved.

Further, in estimating the culpability of the War Office in these two cases, it has to be remembered that there is another charge against the same parties which has been handled at headquarters with the same matchless partiality and levity. I refer to the turf scandal in the same regiment. The facts in this case were that in the race for the Subalterns' Cup at Aldershot in 1895, an unknown horse was surreptitiously substituted for an outsider named Surefoot. The supposed Surefoot, starting at odds of 6 to 1, won the race, defeating the favourite, Lady Margaret, who had been extensively backed at the price of 6 to 4 on. The substitution of an unknown horse for Surefoot had been arranged among the officers who had horses in the race, and may have been known to other officers; but it was never publicly announced, and Lady Margaret was heavily backed by those who were not "in the know," and who consequently lost their money. These facts, being officially brought to the knowledge of the War Office, were referred by them to the Stewards of the National Hunt. The Stewards of the National Hunt, having investigated the case, disqualified all the horses which had run in the race from future races under National Hunt rules; and their decision then came again before the War Office for consideration. Here again the War Office decided, to use the familiar official formula, that there was no necessity for further action, on the ground that the parties to the transaction acted in bonâ-fide ignorance that they were doing anything at all irregular or questionable. The child-like innocents, thus assumed to be unaware of what any casual visitor to a racecourse could see for himself by the light of nature, were men owning and running racehorses, habitually frequenting race meetings, and as familiar with turf usage as might be taken for granted in the case of officers in a cavalry regiment which prides itself on "going the pace." If anybody can seriously believe that this decision on the part of the War Office was arrived at honestly and in good faith, he must be as simple and child-like as the War Office assumes the subalterns of the 4th Hussars to be. Beyond that he could hardly go.

The subalterns whose horses ran on this occasion were Messrs. Barnes, Savory, Francis, Spencer Churchill, and Walker. Of these Messrs. Barnes and Savory assisted just previously in the dragging of Mr. Hodge through the horse trough. The whole five of them took part in organising the dinner at the Nimrod Club a few weeks later, when Mr. Bruce was invited to hear that he was not wanted in their distinguished regiment. Barnes seems to have been prevented from actually attending the dinner, but the invitation was sent to Mr. Bruce in his name. Perhaps the finest stroke of irony in the whole business is that these choice spirits actually took upon themselves—apparently on the strength of some schoolboy tittle-tattle retailed by one of their number—to decide that Mr. Bruce, whom the majority of them had never seen, was not a gentleman qualified to grace so select an assemblage as the Officers' Mess of the 4th Hussars. At the very time when this precious gang met to inform Mr. Bruce the 4th Hussars really could not have him, five of them (including the ringleader) were fresh from the coup which resulted in the defeat of a hot favourite by the last outsider in the betting, and two others had just been treated to what the Commander-in-Chief facetiously calls "drastic" punishment for that extremely gentlemanly and honourable exploit, the horse-troughing of Mr. Hodge. And, to crown the whole thing, the War Office, in its final pronouncement on the Bruce case, solemnly takes its cue from these accomplished judges of all the proprieties, and pleads on their behalf that in vetoing Mr. Bruce's appointment they were acting upon "reports" which had reached the regiment concerning that gentleman. Fancy the heroes of the Hodge outrage and the Surefoot coup shuddering over these "reports," and deciding that they really could not do violence to their feelings by associating with such an ineligible comrade! When Lord Wolseley was casting about for pretexts for washing his hands of the 4th Hussars scandals, I really wonder it did not occur to him to suggest that, in intimating to Mr. Bruce that he was not quite up to 4th Hussars form, they were really paying him about as pretty a compliment as he need have desired. That, now, would have been something like an unanswerable argument.

When one looks at the utter imbecility of the War Office reasoning, the retorts to which it lays itself open at every point, and the mockery of holding out such a performance as the result of an honest and impartial attempt to arrive at the truth and do justice, one can only marvel how men like Lord Wolseley, Sir Redvers Buller, and the Marquis of Lansdowne can ever have allowed themselves to drift into such a humiliating position. But there the matter stands, and it only remains for the public to form its own conclusions and for Parliament to ratify them. As regards Lord Lansdowne, it is difficult to credit that a man who has had a large experience of public affairs and of administrative business, and who has quite recently filled in succession such offices as those of Governor-General of Canada and Viceroy of India, can have had any personal part in this pitiful transaction. Lord Lansdowne must know what is meant in law and in the daily business of life by an impartial inquiry into any doubtful matter of fact, and he would presumably have too much regard for his own reputation to spontaneously offer to the public as an impartial inquiry such a contemptible farce as has been performed in this instance. Lord Lansdowne did not offer to conduct this inquiry himself, and it must be presumed, until the contrary is shown, that he has played a purely formal part in authorising the despatch of the two letters from the War Office. At the same time, Lord Lansdowne has to remember that he is the party primarily responsible to Parliament for all military proceedings transacted in his name, and that one of the reasons for having a civilian in this position is to put a check upon the high-handed, rough-and-ready administrative methods which commend themselves to military men. It is on Lord Wolseley, however, and Sir Redvers Buller that the brunt of this scandal must fall. Whatever ability these two officers have shown in other work which has fallen to their lot, in this instance they have lamentably failed in everything that is required of men in their position. Having undertaken, as the result of a Parliamentary debate, to conduct a personal inquiry into the whole facts of these two cases, they have shirked their undertaking and taken refuge in a proceeding for which the term "inquiry" is a grotesque misnomer. In place of impartial investigation, they have contented themselves with hearing and adopting ex parte statements. They have employed none of the usual means for testing evidence and eliciting truth. They have put forward as their own findings on questions of fact statements which will not bear a moment's investigation. Where gross wrong and injustice have already been committed, they have aggravated the wrong by making official documents the vehicle for open slanders or veiled innuendos against the complainants, and this without a shadow of justification. Worst of all, they have, by these and other equally discreditable methods, palliated and extenuated, not in one particular, but in instance after instance, conduct disgraceful to officers and gentlemen, subversive of all discipline, and prejudicial alike to the good name and the well-being of the whole Army.

Mortlock's China and Glass Business, Oxford-st., has entered its 150th year, being founded by John Mortlock in 1746. It is carried on by John George Mortlock, the great-great-grandson of the founder, who solicits patronage and recommendation.

"CASTE" REVIVED.

The remarkable performance of Mr. John Hare as old Eccles in Robertson's masterpiece known as "Caste"—a performance, by the way, that will be seen at the Lyceum on Saturday afternoon, by the gracious wish of Sir Henry Irving, for the last time before Mr. Hare starts on his second American tour—has very naturally drawn attention to the old play which, as now acted, is as fresh as ever. Attention has recently been directed also to the fact that the scenario of "Caste" is contained in a volume of Christmas stories published by Groombridge & Sons, Paternoster-row, in 1866. The book is called "Rates and Taxes, and How they were Collected." It was edited by Tom Hood the younger, and his fellow-contributors were T. W. Robertson, W. S. Gilbert, W. J. Prowse, Thomas Archer, and Clement Scott. Robertson's story was called "The Poor Rate enfolds a Tale," and here we find the exact plot of the play, now known as "Caste," with some slight alterations in dramatic movement and nomenclature. In the story, Polly Eccles is the heroine, known in the play as Esther Eccles, whilst the Polly of the play is Jenny, who talks exactly as Polly does in the play. The hero in the book is Ensign Daubray not D'Alroy, and he visits the little house at Stangate:—

"The young man was ushered into a room where there were three young ladies, all with dark shiny hair and large eyes; one was mending a pink silk stocking, another was covering a tiny canvas shoe, and the third was recumbent on a dusky sofa, deep in a well-worn and unpleasant-looking romance. The fair young hostess snatched a basin containing vegetables from the table and disappeared, saying, as she returned,

"'You mustn't see what we have got for dinner, or you'll be as wise as we are.'

"'What are you going to have for dinner, Jenny?' the young man asked.

"'Find out,' was Miss Jenny's reply.

"'I wish you'd ask me to dine with you,' said the young soldier.

"'Oh no!' Jenny pursed her lips and shook her head. 'You're too grand for us; you'd be wanting two sorts of puddings and all sorts of things. Then you'd eat too much.'"

Here are the descriptions of Ensign Daubray (D'Alroy) and Captain Swynton (Hawtree) which almost exactly tally with the reading of those characters by Fred Younge and S. B. Bancroft:—

"Ensign Daubray was twenty-three years of age; stood 6 ft. 2 in. in his stockings, and in his saddle weighed over sixteen stone. He was of one of the first families in England. His father was dead, and his mother, who had been a great beauty, and was in her age hook-nosed, majestic, and terrible, had married a second time, and she ruled Lord Clardonax as tightly as she had ruled Fairfax Daubray. She was a haughty, irascible old woman, who knew no law but her own will, and whose pride of birth and family was French, and pre-revolutionary French. Ensign Fairfax Daubray was a fine young fellow, high-hearted and broad-chested, single-minded and straightforward, and not particularly bright. He had a vacant expression of face, which fact, joined to the possession of a tongue either too broad or too thick for his mouth, made him seem stupid. He was fond of field sports, had been reared to regard his lady-mother with a superstitious sort of awe, and was a very quiet, well-disciplined young man.

A Fair Beautiful Skin.—By washing with Sulpholine Soap the natural tint and peach-like bloom of a perfect complexion is ensured.

"Captain Swynton was Daubray's senior by about six years. There was a suspicion of trade in the family of the gallant captain, which he endeavoured to stifle by professing a contempt for commerce that would have been exaggerated in a duke. He was a sort of mild roué and amiable worldling, with a considerable capacity for misconduct, and a fair share of good nature and kind-heartedness. He was never known to do anything exactly noble, nor had he been discovered in the execution of anything particularly mean. He expressed openly and with perfect sincerity his regard for number one, and thought all men should seize every opportunity for self-advancement. He was a good-tempered man about town, who would leave the society of a baronet for that of a lord, unless the baronet happened to be very rich and influential; would drop a viscount for a marquis, and the marquis for a duke. In whatever society he found himself he invariably addressed his conversation to the most important person present, and was considered among his set a very nice, gentleman-like fellow."

The description of old Eccles and the Eccles family is pretty accurate also:—

"The history of the Eccles family was by no means singular or romantic. Of the pre-nuptial antecedents of Mr. and Mrs. Eccles nothing is known. Mr. Eccles had been a mechanic of some sort or other. Mr. Eccles was either overproud, or possessed of mental attributes too high for his station in life—for he would not work. As all men of active minds must find some occupation to interest and amuse them, Mr. Eccles took to drinking, a pursuit which he varied at tolerably regular intervals by beating his wife.

"The poor woman eked out a scanty livelihood by letting off a portion of the house in Stangate, and by her needle. She gladdened Mr. Eccles's home by four pledges of mutual affection—all of the female sex. While the fourth was still a nursling, Mrs. Eccles did the very best possible thing she could do under the circumstances—she died—leaving Mr. Eccles a disconsolate widower with four children.

"The measure of Mr. Eccles's grief may be best judged by the copious means he took for banishing recollection. He wept tears whenever he alluded to his late wife in the presence of a person of sympathetic mind and hospitable intentions. 'Polly,' sobbed and hiccuped Mr. Eccles, 'my eldest gal, is now my only consolation—she takes after her poor mother, which is a comfort to me.'

"And Polly, who was barely nine years of age, took after her mother, and nursed her baby sister, and washed and combed her other little sisters, and waited on her father, and was abused and beaten by him. It was a horrid thing, as Mr. Eccles often remarked, to have ungrateful children."

And here also is a distinct foreshadowing of "Caste":—

"Ensign Daubray was naturally very much shocked at the first sight of Mr. Eccles, and it required all his love to make him remember that so damaged a parent was his Polly's misfortune and not her fault. Mr. Eccles was a dirty-looking old villain, with the flavour of last night's tap-room strong upon him. His address was unpleasing, fawning, and sham-propitiatory. Daubray saw the blackguard under his too civil, over-deferential manner, and wondered why for the sake of his own comfort he (Eccles) did not wash himself oftener. The girls considered their father a good average sort of parent; a little tipsified, but that they were used to; and certainly somewhat eccentric, which was proved by his frequent personal castigation of his daughters—Polly, as the oldest and most habituated, being his favourite for punishment; but a very clever man for all that, and who could have done wonders—had he liked."

And this is how the story ends:—

"And what became of Old Eccles?"

"Don't know," was the reply. "He went somewhere—to the bad, of course, in a general sort of way."

In the story the hero is shot in the Crimea, his wife dies of a broken heart, and the child is adopted by Lady Clardonax, with, for its guardian, Major Swynton, who "returned to England with one of his coat sleeves empty."

The Eccles of John Hare is the best that has yet been seen; as good, in fact, as his original Sam Gerridge, which could not be beaten, though his own son plays it very cleverly, and with rare humour. Hitherto the representatives of old Eccles have dragged the comic scenes, and particularly the soliloquies; but Mr. Hare quickens them, to the great advantage of the play. Miss Mona Oram, who plays Esther Eccles, is a pretty girl and a promising actress, but it is a difficult matter to follow brilliant originals.

Few better English plays have been written since Boucicault's "London Assurance," which is fifty-five years old, and "Caste" will live longer than any of the best problem plays ever conceived.

"ALL COULEUR DE ROSE!"

The enterprising young managers of the Haymarket Theatre have, with rare tact and cleverness, exactly hit the right nail on the head. They have recognised the spirit of the times. It is no use arguing and saying I do not like this, and I do not like that: the public knows precisely what it wants, and the public will have what it wants or nothing. Managers, when they produce failures, always blame the public; the public turn their backs on the managers. Mr. Edward Rose has managed to infuse into his dramatic version of Mr. Stanley Weyman's novel a charm and interest, which will very probably astonish and delight the author of the book; for be it undersood "Under the Red Robe" is certainly neither the most exciting nor the most eventful of Mr. Weyman's works. The story is full of possibilities, but the opportunities seem somehow to have escaped notice. The book looks to the outsider as containing material for a one-act play, no more. Be this as it may, Mr. Edward Rose has certainly made the most of the situations afforded to him, and the play presented last Saturday for the first time received the marked and enthusiastic approval of a very select and experienced audience.

Mr. Herbert Waring, the tender-hearted villain-hero of this modern romance, appeared rather nervous at the outset; he seemed to say to himself, "It is this hat that makes me such a blackguard," so he kept throwing it about at odd corners of the stage, where it was picked up first by Miss Coleman, who placed it carefully on the table; then by mysterious hands at the wings, who seemed quite sorry such a nice hat should be so mercilessly chucked about. However, as the play proceeded, Waring forgot all about his head-dress, and acted as only Waring can. Miss Winifred Emery's character is also rather of an uncertain, "first she would, and then she wouldn't" type; but this clever lady is certainly seen to great advantage in the new play, and to her credit be it said, the part is one teeming with difficulties which she attacked boldly and fearlessly, the end being that Miss Emery's performance of Renée de Cocheforêt is delightful, womanly, and full of grace and charm. The Cardinal Richelieu in Mr. Rose's play does not tax the energies of Mr. Sydney Valentine, but what little he has to do he does well, and his picturesque appearance is a study to be remembered. One of the best acted characters in this romantic story is played by Mr. Bernard Gould, who, as the rough, honest Lieutenant, who determines to have justice at any price, acted splendidly, and struck exactly the right key at the right moment; in fact, he is really the hero and best fellow in the play. Miss Eva Moore is prettily confiding as the poor little love-lorn wife, and wins the sympathies of the audience immediately. Mr. Cyril Maude acted so humorously and quaintly as the vacillating Captain Larolle, that one and all expressed their regret when he was so rudely rolled over into the precipice by the gentleman who had been so cruelly robbed of his power of speech.

Mr. Frederick Harrison and Mr. Cyril Maude are sincerely to be congratulated on their clever management. The Haymarket Theatre is entirely redecorated and refurnished; it is bright, it is pleasing to the eye, and every seat is luxuriously comfortable. There was not one single discordant note to mar the success of last Saturday's production of "Under the Red Robe," and there is no reason why this play should not achieve the same triumph as the "Prisoner of Zenda" at the St. James's. The public taste is in the direction of philosophic romance. It is a romance of the Zenda pattern, full of brightness, life, and interest. Those who have read Mr. Weyman's novel will, of course, go and see Mr. Rose's romance at the Haymarket, and those who have not read the book or seen the play will be wise to do both. In fact, at this most popular playhouse everything is at present—and long may it remain so — Couleur de Rose!

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE Czarina, in giving her impressions of Paris at Darmstadt, is reported to have spoken of the universal enthusiasm as never to be forgotten. She wondered what it may not rise to when the Czar and herself have paid some longer visits. Is this a time to remind her of the Spanish proverb that advises us never to return to a house where we have been splendidly received? "Grandmamma" could have told her at Balmoral of a reception far more brilliant, bewildering, and enthusiastic. How many people are there now living who witnessed the Queen's triumphant drive in 1855 from the Western Railway terminus to St. Cloud? I have only met two. One is an old lady, widow of a French General who was then serving at the Palace as Master of the Household; the other is Sir Charles Dilke. The old lady tells me the Queen wore a white silk dress with blue satin bretelles, and a white silk capote trimmed with pink roses. She was flushed with excitement, as was the other day her Imperial granddaughter. People noticed that she had le geste large in bowing to the public, and was allowed by the Emperor, who sat facing her in the carriage, to do most of the bowing. The Prince looked cold and un peu gêné. How could he be otherwise? He had to be polite, and yet he must have felt that he was to show consciousness that the roar of acclamation kept up the whole way was meant chiefly for the Queen. But there were compensations. Another lady, who was in the Pontoise station when the train was being shunted, tells me that all the grand people of the Seine-et-Oise were admitted there by tickets issued by the Prefect of the Department. The Royal party was in a saloon carriage. Napoleon III. drew his Royal guests to the window. There were two chubby children—a boy and a girl. The boy was in a Highland dress and the image of good humour. The Queen was in her white and blue gown and bonnet, with the Prince at her side. All the ladies cried, as if with one voice, "Regardez donc le Prince-Epoux. Mais quel bel homme! Mon Dieu, qu'il est beau!" They quite forgot that the Royal party were not a show. It is to be feared the Queen heard the chorus of admiration the Prince Consort's good looks called forth. She seemed for a moment out of countenance, and then drew back as far as she could.

The first Sir Charles Dilke was in 1855 a Commissioner at the Universal Exhibition, which was the occasion for the Queen's visit. His son, the present baronet, then twelve years old, was taken by him everywhere. They drove in the line of the Royal procession from St. Lazare to St. Cloud. There were 120,000 soldiers under arms lining the road the whole way. All that rank, fashion, riches, and a well-dressed population could furnish in the way of a multitude was behind them on the footway. There was unreserved enthusiasm. Nor was it an enthusiasm of "suggestion," got up by papers acting on secret bargains. The working classes (what a happy time!) never looked then at a paper. Novelty and novel influences, with some other causes I shall presently touch upon, made the Queen's visit to Paris the greatest street function of the century. What more startling antithesis could there be than a very genuine friendship, paraded before the world, of the niece of the Prince Regent and the nephew of Napoleon? A war that they waged in partnership had brought them together. But their meeting seemed the preface of at new era of peace and generous internationalism.

France and England were then revelling in the wealth of the still fresh railway evolution, from which too much was expected. The gold of California and Australia had been flowing into both countries. Paris was so rich and brilliant that Hyde Park could not touch the Champs Elysées and the Bois in the show of faultless equipages. Every Englishman was thought a milor or a millionaire. The submarine Dover-Calais telegraph was scarcely four years old. Beautiful women of no birth, whom enormously rich Englishmen had married for love, came to shine at the Imperial Court. There was a rage for belles miladys and jolies meeses. Paris did not dream that England contained any number of those well-meaning, uninteresting persons who now come in "personally conducted" droves as trippers, to put up at cheap hotels and bargain and push their way in bad French. An intellectual class reigned over French intellects. It was formed of men who had been ambassadors or diplomats in England, who had a Whig reverence for the English Constitution, English Liberalism, and English comforts, and were enamoured of Scott, Byron, and Dickens. They had their whiskers trimmed à l'Anglaise, corresponded with Lady Waldegrave, spoke English, and tried to secure rich English girls for daughters-in-law. One heard as much English as French at Guizot's soirées and in the editorial room of the Débats. Léon Say was an English Liberal. Le Siècle swore by Stuart Mill. M. Dupont White, Mme. Carnot's father, was furnishing that paper with translations from Mill's works. Persigny was an out-and-out Anglomaniac. De Flahault, a great man at the Imperial Court and a son of Talleyrand, had married, when a much younger man, a Scotch peeress in her own right, who had the most agreeable house in Paris. Railways so far had only facilitated relations between French and English of the right sort. The idea grew up that, the more both people knew of each other the deeper they would fall in love. They could only gain by borrowing of each other. Frenchmen tried to like weak, lukewarm whiskey, pickles, and mustard, and gin as the post-prandial petit verre. They knew nothing of the ways of English "Society." English governesses, nurses, and nursery arrangements were honestly admired. The governesses and nurses were highly paid. Miss Shaw was in readiness to be the angel of the coming Prince Imperials. Mr. Gamble was practically Master of the Horse and ruled over the Imperial mews.

The Empress spoke English better than French, and had received all her school education at Clifton. Not one of those mischief-making journals who were so near dragging Lord Rosebery into a war, was then in being. Even Lord Henry Seymour had been idealised by French pens. Eugène Sue had served him up to the readers of "Les Mystères de Paris" as Rudolph, Prince of Gerolstein. The late Duke of Hamilton's father was a Society king, and his sons were petted by the Empress as the only cousins of the Emperor in whom she could take a pride. Miss Skittles was beginning to be talked of as a power in the world. She had been imported by General Fleury with a number of English and Irish horses. Cora Pearl's red hair, falling over her shoulders, and her figure in the saddle were attracting the envy of the Court ladies. Millionaires strove to buy, at no matter what prices, Bonnington and Morlands. Every freshet of feeling, every fad of fashion, every social or literary influence; made for the enthusiastic welcome that the Queen received. Those who most hated the Empire agreed to hail her as she drove to St. Cloud. The effect of that visit greatly facilitated the negotiations for the Cobden-Rouher treaty of commerce. The Imperial Government did not get up the show, except so far as soldiers, illuminations, and flags went. The Emperor certainly had had no means to suggestionise, because nobody but officials read the papers that took their orders from the Government. He could not have made thousands and thousands of ladies pay £20 or £30 apiece for places on stands in balconies. France poured out spontaneously all that gives her highest distinction before the Queen.

Lady Seton, and some other subscribers to Truth, have written to know whether they can get copies of the Nicholas-Alexandra medal, by Chaplain, struck at the Mint in presence of their Imperial Majesties. One might now almost as well wish for the moon. But nine impressions—three in gold, three in silver, three in copper—were taken. The gold ones were given to Nicholas, Alexandra, and M. Faure; the silver to the Empress-Dowager, the Grand Duchess Olga, and Mme. Faure; and the copper to nurses. Model and mould were broken.

Some ladies—evidently Equal Righters—reproach me with having last week devoted far more space to the Czar than to his consort. I did so for obvious reasons. He was born and brought up to inherit the Crown of All the Russias. The smallest accident might have prevented her from sharing that crown. He is also a more complex person than the Czarina. Indeed, he is singularly involved. And yet the sum-total of the maze of involutions is simplicity. He is not a man to be painted in strong colours and bold strokes. The Czarina is in some respects a blank page. Her ready flush, free motions, and onward impulse as she moves show Guelph impetuosity. She is easy to read, and affords pleasant reading. The grandmamma's example and her own companionship with her brother in his sports and exercises have helped to make her what she is. The Czarina and the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt were constantly together after her sister Irene's marriage. A girl who is the comrade of a high-hearted youth becomes fearlessly sincere. She and he were a good deal with the Empress Frederick, whose place in the Taunus Hills is a German Balmoral, though the castle looks like a Berlin palace with a great central dome. Her Imperial Highness has not chic. She does not need it. Her day dresses were changed rather often, and too visibly new—that is to say, they were hardly a part of herself. She has a white neck, free from every kind of disfigurement. Why, then, wear those very high collarettes invented for Princesses who must muffle up to hide scars and cicatrices? We thought the white boa of ostrich feathers—worn the first day—extravagantly fine. Elégance keeps clear of the phenomenal. Nor were the collarettes light enough for Parisian taste. One of them was of pale yellow faille, pinked, and so high as to hide the back of the head. It was worn with a pelerine of crape, fan-pleated over satin, the colour of a ripe pumpkin or very deep orange. A thread of gold beads marked each pleat. The combination would have suited a bold, black-eyed luscious Oriental beauty or gitana. I can add nothing to what I said last week about features, hair, expression. But I may now say that her Majesty has the hearty laugh when amused of the Prince of Wales. She and the Czar laughed like a pair of children at the points of Réjane and Coquelin. She must have thought Réjane beautifully dressed, for she eyed her all over. Depend upon it, she will adopt in a modified form the seventeenth and eighteenth century costumes that she saw at Versailles. It was noticed that her voice was full and mellow and the Czar's low and sweet. A French attendant says that the Czar only hints his wishes, and is easy to serve. Both Czar and Czarina were delighted with M. Faure. He was not a bit touchy. This enabled them to use their eyes in all directions, whilst he entertained them with his conversation.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE following announcement, dear Lady Betty, was made in a provincial newspaper :—"During his temporary retirement Lord Rosebery intends to cultivate his voice."

I am in a position to supplement this interesting information. The ex-Liberal Leader is now practising the well-known song—

"'Tis the last Rosebery of summer

His short career, however, must necessarily remind many of this epitaph :—

"It is so soon that I am done for,
I wonder what I was begun for."

The political attitude of Lord Rosebery has been prophetically described by Lady Dufferin in the "Lament of the Irish Emigrant" :—

"I'm sitting on the stile, Joey,
Where we sat side by side."

A correspondent has addressed the following letter to me :—"Sir,—Last week I advertised for a servant, and only one applicant favoured me with a call. The spirit of sarcasm then prompted me to advertise for a 'lady scullery-maid.' The next morning nearly two hundred women applied for the situation! One of these stipulated that she should be permitted to have two evenings 'out' a week, as she was 'anxious not to drop entirely out of society!' Another very civilly informed me that if she accepted the situation my wife and myself must not expect to be recognised by her in public!—Carlton Club."

As a pendant to this letter, it may be observed that the post of secretary to the Turf Club having recently become vacant, six hundred applications were tendered for the appointment! There appears to be too much education and too little energy.

Another correspondent writes :—"Has not the time arrived when the grotesque procession of the Lord Mayor should be abandoned? He is the king of commerce; the chief magistrate of the richest and greatest city in the world. Is it not a grave scandal that so important an official should commence his reign by parading through the streets accompanied by allegorical cars? These processions have long ago ceased to be picturesque, and only the riff-raff of the town assembles to see them pass. Moreover, the traffic is seriously disturbed by closing important thoroughfares for several hours on Lord Mayor's day, which entails a considerable loss to the community, whilst causing much inconvenience. Every ancient custom is not necessarily worthy to be perpetuated. Our forefathers burned heretics alive. This may have been a particularly picturesque proceeding, but in these matter-of-fact days such an exhibition might interfere inconveniently with business.—Ex-Sheriff."

The writer of the foregoing letter merely reproduces the thoughts that are in the minds of all sensible persons. These processions are not ornamental, useful, or enjoyable, and they are certainly undignified.

There is much grumbling with regard to a subject which has already been commented upon in these columns. Many collectors of pictures and of works of art have received letters asking them to lend their treasures for exhibition at a private gallery. Why should any man in his senses lend his pictures to the proprietor of a private gallery for the latter to make money by exhibiting them? The majority of those who possess works of art do not object to lend them occasionally for public exhibition, or to assist some charity, but it is sheer impudence for A to expect B to lend him pictures in order to pocket the profit upon the transaction himself. Supposing A were to ask B to lend him £1,000 to invest for six months in some perfectly safe undertaking, so that A might make 4 per cent. upon the £1,000 belonging to B, what would B do? This, however, is precisely the same thing as when the proprietor of a private gallery asks a collector to lend him his art treasures for the former to exhibit for his own profit. There are many other objections to the proceeding, but these need not be specified for the moment.

Eighty-three candidates applied for the appointment of Chief Officer of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade. Twelve of these have been selected for further consideration, and in due course the number will be reduced to either two or three, when the names of the latter, together with their qualifications for the post, will be submitted to the London County Council, which will then decide between the rival candidates. It is supposed by those who have the means of forming an intelligent opinion upon the subject that the appointment will be given to a naval man. The majority of those who have experience in the matter of the Fire Brigade declare that the training in the Navy is best suited to fit a man for this post. It would be much regretted by Londoners generally if, after the appointment of Chief Officer had been held by one man for thirty years, it became subject to frequent changes.

Candidates for the Diplomatic Service have a grievance. Some few years ago Lord Rosebery and Sir Philip Currie decided to make shorthand writing a voluntary subject in the examinations for this branch of the public service. So severe is the competition, however, that no candidate can afford to ignore it, and it is therefore, for all practical purposes, compulsory. As a matter of fact, shorthand, though very useful in almost every profession, is of no use whatever to a diplomatist. The latter cannot take notes of conversations with statesmen in the barefaced manner that journalists do; nor can Ambassadors dictate their despatches, which have to be carefully thought out sentence by sentence. Lord Dufferin is the only British Ambassador who up to now has dictated despatches to a shorthand writer. He contracted the habit when he was Viceroy of India, and it may be added that he revised these despatches so often and altered them so considerably that he rather lost than gained time by the operation. The most celebrated crammer for the Diplomatic Service is opposed to the introduction of shorthand in these examinations, and several of the authorities at the Foreign Office strongly object to it. Type-writing, on the contrary, is being generally adopted by diplomatists, some of the younger members of the Service being especially facile in manipulating the machine. Almost all the despatches are now type-written, with the exception of those to be submitted to the Queen, who has given particular instructions that type-written documents should not be presented to her, as her failing eye-sight makes it difficult for her to read them.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

THE Cesarewitch is a race of which backers will long retain a dismally distinct recollection. The scratchings and unsuccessful trials were really on a wholesale scale during the last ten days. I twice warned my readers that Portmarnock might not stand a thorough preparation, and advised them to leave him alone until the day of running. The collapse of The Rush was quite as disastrous, and a great deal of "public" money was lost over Victor Wild, whose value has been considerably depreciated by the muddy-minded policy which has been pursued with him. Phœbus Apollo proved a wretched substitute for The Rush, and the numerous friends of Nouveau Riche were soon out of their suspense. I never could understand how any rational being could fancy this horse after his running with Labrador at York, and it is now certain that he is deficient in stamina, and Son o' Mine is another starter who had no pretensions to stay this course. Cypria, who was started just on the off chance, in spite of her having done badly in a trial, was beaten hopelessly after a mile had been traversed. The most amazing feature in the betting was the craze for Vanguard, who broke down when running in this race three years ago, and he has never been seen out since. Vanguard was the final tip of all the "sharps," and he was actually backed, and by "astute tacticians," down to 16 to 1, the woeful result of all the crack-brained folly being that his chance was fully disposed of quite two miles from home. I was always of the opinion that Count Schomberg was decidedly overweighted, and especially as it was obvious when this horse was seen out in the summer that he had neither grown nor improved in any way. After the race for the Doncaster Cup I predicted that whatever beat Laodamia would win, and if St. Bris had been out of the way Mr. Fulton's mare would certainly have come in first. The heavy ground stopped her. I announced on October 1 that Laodamia had been backed by her owner for £1,000, and why there should have been so much subsequent fussing and manœuvring in the market it is difficult to understand, but if Mr. Fulton desired to hedge his money he had every opportunity to do so. I wrote of St. Bris that he was much fancied by clever people; but it is a veritable leaping in the dark to support a horse for the Cesarewitch which has never been tried to stay the distance, and one certainly was not encouraged to depend upon the Kingsclere stable, after its numerous and egregious blunders in the various three-year-old races of the season. I pointed out a fortnight ago that a perfectly insane mistake had been made in starting Regret for the Jockey Club Stakes, instead of Labrador, and after the running in the Champion Stakes it must be palpable to every one that this view is correct. Labrador defeated Sir Visto every bit as easily as did Persimmon, running over the same course and on the same terms.

Knight of the Thistle is evidently a preposterously over-rated colt, for in the Select Plate Macbriar gave him a stone and beat him by a head after a splendid finish. The Cambridgeshire backers of Mr. McCalmont's beast may look upon their money as gone, for next Wednesday Knight of the Thistle will have to give Macbriar 3 lb.! Mr. Brassey also gave the ring a good turn in the Lowther Stakes, and for which Earwig and Rampion were great "pots," but Bay Ronald walked away from them, and Avilion made such an exhibition of herself that she can have no chance for the Cambridgeshire. It was a great mistake to have struck Bay Ronald out of the Cambridgeshire, in which handicap he had only 6 st. 7 lb. to carry.

The two-year-old racing was much more exciting than could have been expected. The result of the Clearwell Stakes was disastrous to backers, Goletta and Berzak running a dead heat, and long odds had been freely betted on the filly, but her supporters really got off lightly, as in another two strides the colt would have won. Simoon won the Bretby Stakes, in accordance with my prediction, but her owner was very lucky, as Simola really ought to have carried off the race, but she is apparently a jade. The defeat of Velasquez in the Middle Park Plate was the great tragedy of the week, but, with the ground a swamp, and Lord Rosebery's colt manifestly unable to move freely, it was astounding that backers should have been such infatuated moon-calves as to plunge recklessly on Velasquez, who was apparently regarded as an absolute certainty, and those superlatively prudent people who only have two or three bets a week on carefully-selected good things were putting their money down. Velasquez appeared a lamentable object as he floundered down to the post, and Lord Rosebery was very ill-advised in starting the colt. He has very small feet, and he is not a powerful colt. It will never be safe to trust him on heavy ground. On Friday Velasquez was literally never in the race, which Galtee More won all the way, and, indeed, Mr. Gubbins's colt is just the stamp of animal to show his best form in deep ground, and he seemed to delight in the mud.

Gulistan has been prepared to run for the £2,000 three-year-old stakes at Sandown Park to-morrow, and he ought to win this race, although he will not be really quite fit, as there is only Serfdom to beat and he has a trifle the best of the weights with Lord Londonderry's filly.

There has been a great deal of speculation on the Cambridgeshire, which will be a very heavy betting race. It is wonderful how many horses are strongly fancied for this handicap, and it will be a very much more interesting race than the Cesarewitch in all respects. Laodamia (6 yrs., 8 st. 9 lb.) has the same weight which she carried as a three-year-old, when she ran very prominently in the race which Molly Morgan won. That Laodamia will not disgrace herself is certain, but I do not fancy she is going to win. It seems to me that if Omnium II. (4 yrs., 9 st. 1 lb.) comes to the post fit and well he will beat all the top weights, and whatever beats the French horse will win. Omnium II. is a real flyer, and he has fine speed, in addition to abundant stamina. He ought unquestionably to have won the Ascot Cup, and I hope that he will run for it again next year. Of course it may be true that Pas de Danse (3 yrs., 6 st. 10 lb.), the stable companion of Omnium II., is better at the weights, in which case the race will assuredly go to France. The market transaction must after a few days discover which is to be the trusted one, and my own very decided opinion is in favour of Omnium II. I have no fancy for Thais (3 yrs., 8 st.), as the manner in which she finished for the One Thousand makes me feel very doubtful whether she will stay the course, and if Marsh's stable is to carry off this race the winner will be the French mare Ghislaine (5 yrs., 7 st. 9 lb.). Canterbury Pilgrim (3 yrs., 8 st. 1 lb.) will certainly defeat the Prince of Wales's filly, who, moreover, is not at all likely to have any chance with Shaddock at even weights. The Kingsclere horses are to be tried this week, and I shall be vastly surprised if anything in the stable beats Shaddock (3 yrs., 8 st.), although some people fancy that St. Bris (3 yrs., 7 st. 7 lb.) will prove the best of the lot, but then Mr. Lowe's colt is surely held safely by Laodamia. I have reason to believe that Shaddock is really much better than Labrador. Chit Chat's defeat in the Cesarewitch gave infinite satisfaction to every one except the backers of the colt. He has since been well backed for next week's race, and it is asserted that he would have won the Cesarewitch at the Bushes, which is all fiddle-faddle moonshine, as St. Bris had the race in hand at that point. I have not the least fancy for Chit Chat (3 yrs., 6 st. 5 lb.) nor for Kilcock (4 yrs., 9 st. 4 lb.), who cannot stay the course. Any sane person who backs Marco (4 yrs., 8 st. 10 lb.) after his ignominious defeat last week, must surely think he "knows something," as this horse is obviously held safe by Shaddock. Winkfield's Pride (3 yrs., 6 st. 10 lb.) is reported to be an Irish good thing, but the Kempton running of Bellevin appears to have discouraged his friends. La Sagesse (4 yrs., 6 st. 10 lb.) won last year's Oaks, and her stupendous degeneration since that achievement is proved by the fact that this year's Oaks winner is made to give her 19 lb. La Sagesse has been going remarkably well in her gallops of late, and she went particularly well last Wednesday over the Cambridgeshire distance with S. Loates on her back. Her stable companion, Roquebrune, need not be thought of, as she has fallen lame again. Macbriar (3 yrs., 7 st. 1 lb.) is an awkward horse for a boy to ride, and Red Heart (4 yrs., 7 st. 13 lb.) will not be properly fit. This horse is more likely to win a good handicap at one of the "back-end" meetings—probably the Derby Cup. Victor Wild (6 yrs., 9 st. 9 lb.) is held perfectly safe by Omnium II., and Count Schomberg (4 yrs., 7 st. 10 lb.) has no chance after his last week's exhibition, while Teufel (3 yrs., 6 st. 7 lb.) will probably fail to stay the course. Champaubert (3 yrs., 8 st. 8 lb.) is a certain starter, but he cannot beat Omnium II. Lord Rosebery's lot are to be tried this week, and I expect that Quarrel (5 yrs., 8st. 9 lb.) will prove the best of these, but he is not likely to win. My own fancy is for Shaddock and Omnium II., but this race should be left alone until the day of running, as much may depend upon the state of the course.

There are sure to be large fields at Newmarket next week, particularly for the handicaps of all classes and for the selling races, and backers will do well to exercise extreme caution in their transactions, as there are likely to be many petrifying upsets of recent public form; and if the ground is even more heavy than it was last week (which is exceedingly probable to be the case), it will be an affair of heads and tails in most of the events.

There are thirty entries for the Criterion Stakes on Tuesday, and, in the certain absence of Velasquez, this race will fall to Goletta, who should decidedly be able to beat Eager. There are fifty-four entries for the Cheveley Stakes on Wednesday, including Berzak, Smean, Jaquemart, and Arc-en-Ciel, and the American colt will win. For the Dewhurst Plate there are seventy-three entries, including Minstrel, Filliford, Falkland, Berzak, Smean, Goletta, Simoon, and Guernsey. It is unlucky for Mr. Gubbins that he did not enter Galtee More for this race. Of the public lot I would prefer Berzak, who is a better stayer than Goletta, and he may very likely be reserved for this race. There may, however, be some trials in the course of the next few days, the results of which will change the aspect of the Dewhurst Plate. Catherine Luther (the 3,900 gs. yearling by St. Simon out of Heresy) may be galloped, and so also may the Duke of Westminster's Orelio, brother to Ormonde. If Orelio is still backward, then Simoon will no doubt be the best from Kingsclere.

There are twenty-two acceptances for the three-year-old Free Handicap (A.F.), which will be one of the most valuable races of the week. The list is headed by Persimmon (9 st. 3 lb.), and St. Frusquin (9 st.), then comes Galeazzo with 8 st. 6 lb. In the absence of these horses it is highly probable that Jolly Boat will win this race for Lord Zetland, if she can beat Bay Ronald.

Naturally, my remarks last week about parsons and professionalism have brought down upon me a certain number of hostile critics who ask how it is possible to justify professionalism, having regard to the recent suspension of the Reading F.C. and Mr. Roston Bourke, who, to prevent the Reading F.C. being disappointed in a match, played certain men as honorary members of the Holloway College F.C. That the sentence in this case is due to the fact that the London Football Association has refused to allow professional teams to play in its competitions there can be little doubt. It is also hinted that the Football Association is going to attempt methods of coercion. Be this as it may, and reprehensible as such conduct may be, it has nothing to do with the attacks made on men because they play football or cricket for money. It was pointed out in the article referred to that it was extremely important that the interests of those who do not play football for payment should be carefully protected. The present position of the London Football Association is due to the fact that twenty years ago, amateurs did not realise how imperative it was to secure such protection and so prevent themselves being swamped by the paid player. The thanks of all Rugby players are due to Mr. Rowland Hill and others, for the energy and foresight they exhibited in protecting amateur Rugby players. The Rugby Union had been founded and organised by those who had no desire to be paid for playing the game. When the North had to declare itself professional after an unsportsmanlike attempt to veil the true character of its methods, by saying that only broken time was paid for, then the Rugby Union once and for all declared itself for amateurism and scouted utterly the miserable subterfuge of broken time. The professionals had no difficulty in organising themselves. Not only was there the old system of the Rugby Union, but there were the more modern methods of Association football, with its league and cup-ties inmumerable, both great and small, from which they could adopt all that seemed best for their own development. There is ample room for both to flourish. But it requires a much older and more experienced body to guard the interests of the amateur than those of paid players, where commercial principles can be brought into play. The consequence is that to-day the Rugby amateur finds his position strong and powerful. This result is due to Mr. Rowland Hill and others. In Association football the amateur finds his interests being more and more pushed into the background. Unfortunately for him, the Football Association recognised professionalism. But that is no reason why his interests should be allowed to drop altogether. Nor is there any legal or moral reason why the parent body should compel minor organisations that owe it allegiance to provide cup-ties and organise competitions for professional clubs when such events and such organisations have been strictly confined to amateurs. The amateur strength lies practically in the metropolis, where some association is necessary to foster and protect it. The impossibility of the unpaid player competing succeesfully against the "pro" has been clearly shown by the fact that the Football Association has started the amateur cup. The Association in its chief competitions has therefore recognised the necessity of dividing the two classes of players. On the same principle it should recognise the same necessity in minor events, and as a mere matter of policy, apart from all questions of justice and fairness, it should be extremely cautious about interfering with those few minor competitions which are exclusively devoted to the amateur interest. But to go a step further; it is extremely unfair to force the professionals upon a purely amateur body whose interests in the cups and competitions are vested. Even in the South the professional party is quite strong enough to look after itself without pot-hunting on the amateur preserves. It would no doubt be beneficial to their "gates" if they could meet some of the amateur clubs in these competitions. If they are so anxious to fight them for a cup, let them start a cup open to both classes. In a multitude of cup ties there is money.

At last Sunderland have scored a victory. Against Liverpool they put on three goals in the first half, and then only won by four goals to three. The figures are given because they clearly show a terrible falling off in the play, and an inability to keep up high pressure all through, and when the game gets tiring the defence is weak. These facts show the need for some strong organiser to take the team in hand. Marlow played up remarkably well in the heavy ground against the Caledonians. They soon attacked, and Ellerton and Davis were very busy, while Murison alone of the "Calies" forward seemed able to do anything when they found themselves beaten. It was very creditable to Ealing, a genuine amateur team drawn from a single suburb, to make the good fight they did against Lincoln city. Chater was decidedly good forward, where the players in their anxiety to combine and pass accurately, keep the ball too long. The halves were not very good, but Wills in goal was decidedly good. There is no reason why the club, which is well managed, should not have a brilliant future. The Casuals put a very hot team in the field against Middlesbrough, and simply had matters their own way from start to finish.

It is only fair to Middlesex Hospital to say that although they scratched last Saturday's match, they will play every game on the card, instead of scratching all matches till the middle of November, when four or five of their best players will be available for the first time this season, owing to exams. I am very glad some energy is being thrown into the game, and the Hospital is therefore likely to go forward. It showed good sportsmanship on the part of Blackheath to allow a substitute to play for Crimp, the Old Merchant Taylor half, when he broke his collar bone. This accident necessarily weakened the Old Boys, who had been playing a strong defensive game. The Heathen forwards require a lot of polishing up. The Scottish effected a pleasant surprise against Kensington. Their forwards are playing better than many anticipated, and the outsides have pace and can score. St. Thomas's should have a good team. They started well against Richmond, but subsequently the combination of their opponents' outsides was too much for them. Ashford played a good game. The slippery ground spoiled the match between Cooper's Hill and the Harlequins. Todd scored the only point for the college, which will have a dangerous team this year. Croydon are going very strongly, and the decisive way in which they beat the R.M.A., Woolwich, showed their combination at its best. Flint showed excellent pace on heavy ground, and scored twice. The Newport outsides showed that they needed Gould in their match with Cardiff. Thomas, their back, played a splendid game. Cardiff attacked desperately, and were rather unfortunate in having a try scored against them by their old club mate Pearson.

A recently-tried action between a man named Green and the Dunlop Tyre Company revealed a curious state of morality on the part of the company. Briefly, an agent of the company swore that he engaged Green at 10s. a week and a couple of sets of tyres a year and reasonable expenses to ride as an amateur for the company. The National Cyclist Union, perhaps getting wind of what had happened, refused to license the rider. Hence the trouble that arose. The fact that the company allowed its conduct to be exposed in court shows that the prick of a sporting conscience cannot puncture the commercial spirit of the company. It is scandalous that a rich and powerful company should indulge in such malpractices. There is no doubt that any minor maker and his goods would be barred altogether for similar conduct. It is hopeless to expect any fairness in amateur riding when a company like the Dunlop connives at such trickery. Whether the N.C.U. will have the pluck to tackle the Dunlop people remains to be seen.

It is very much to be feared that Bacon will not find professional running a very lucrative game. It is no fault of his that his matches with Conneff have been such miserable fiascos. After his opponent's wretched display in the three miles, it was hoped he would make a better show in the mile, and to judge by the newspaper reports of the training this was bound to be the case. But Bacon played with his opponent. He let him make the pace, or rather the trot, and taking the lead a hundred yards from home won hands down in 4 min. 35 sec. Downer's race with Mills was a very different story. The ex-amateur had three yards in 150, and was never pressed. He ran right through in fine form. It is a pity he was not on the same mark as Mills. The sprinters will find more opponents than the long distance men. Amongst amateurs, Monro appears to be blessed with perpetual youth. To follow up his recent brilliant running, he has won the Lea Harriers annual Epping walk with two minutes' start. It was a sealed handicap, and he was only beaten by the holder, Zuttner, for first place by a hundred yards. All the walkers started together, and he was second. The Southwark Harriers, who won the South of the Thames Cross-country Championship last year, have been admitted members of the Southern Counties Cross-country Association, although they do train within four miles of Charing Cross.

A correspondent considers the suggestion of a veteran cricketer that the position of the fielder should be given in the score-sheet an admirable one. He further suggests that, if the idea is carried out, the fact of a batsman playing on should be mentioned, and also the name of a fielder who throws a man out. Mr. C. E. Green well deserves the dinner that is to be given in his honour by the Essex County Cricket Club. He stood by the Club in the perilous times, and now that its position is assured his efforts deserve recognition. The out-fielding at Leyton, however, will never be good so long as football is played on the ground. The need for good class football grounds round London is very pressing, and both the Football Association and Rugby Union ought officially to take up the matter and see what can be done.

The Billiard Season has just begun. Spiller and Dawson showed rather in and out form. After a bad start the former pulled himself together and proved that he has a great future before him. Time made the game a draw. Roberts began the winter more brilliantly than he has for some time, and his play against Peel would lead one to expect some phenomenal work before the spring comes.

An Old Westminster boy, who is the father of a Westminster boy, begged me to continue to urge the desirability of the school returning to rowing once again. There is, however, now no need to do so, for he has kindly sent a note saying that at a meeting of the school debating society a motion by Mr. More, captain of the cricket club, that rowing should be revived at Westminster was carried by acclamation. At Cambridge there are some really good Freshers, and Adam Bell, the President, is to be congratulated on having stronger material to hand than any of his predecessors for many a long year. There is Dudley Ward, the Eton seven, Guinness, the sculler, and several other Etonians, including Goldie, son of the old stroke who stopped the previous run of Oxford wins. May the omen be a good one! In the Fours the Hall have Bell, Bieber, and Fernie, but they seem to lack pace. "Third" have Barber, D. Ward, Guinness, and Brand. They should stand a good chance of winning if they have some good coaching. A little of Muttlebury for a week would work wonders. Caius, unfortunately, have none of their victorious crew left. The new men though light, should be capable of making a very fair crew.

With reference to the report that Mr. R. C. Lehmann is going to coach Harvard, I may say that the matter is not yet settled, but that it is highly probable that he will accept an invitation that has been extended to him to coach Harvard for a race in America at the end of June next. Obviously the Harvard men pay no attention to the Press blackguarding of English sportsmen which the Niagara yachting incident recently raised.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

My dear Ben,—It cannot be said that the position of the markets has in any way improved during the past week. It is true that the settlement passed off without the crop of failures which had been looked for, but there is no doubt that a great deal of hidden trouble has been shown to exist by a persistent stream of sales of South African shares, which clearly indicate forced closing.

A Disastrous Settlement, and After.

Many circumstances have contributed to render the mid-October settlement, which has just been got over, a very disastrous one for all but the ursine party. The chief spot of weakness was the South African department, in which sales have again been pressed for Paris account, while here, too, there has been a great deal of forced closing of the accounts of operators who could not pay their differences. Three or four jobbers were helped over, and at one time when the Consolidated Goldfields dividend was announced, it looked as if the market would rally again. A resumption of sales, however, shows that all the weak elements have not yet been eliminated. The account is certainly much reduced, and as soon as the remaining weak accounts have been liquidated, the market should be ready for a sharp recovery, the mining industry in the Transvaal itself being in a satisfactory position. The more general trouble is the continued efflux of gold to the United States and the further rise in the Money Market. The action of the Directors of the Bank of England in not raising the rate last week to 3½ per cent. is being criticised in some quarters, as it may now render an advance to 4 per cent. necessary; but it seems to me, to use a vulgar phrase, that this is as broad as it's long, for the gold taken by the United States would have had to go there anyhow, that country being in a position to draw supplies from us as the balance of trade is in its favour. This circumstance, and the growing certainty that the sound money party will carry the election, have acted as a support to the American market in the midst of gloomy surroundings. Home Rails have been affected by the dear money "bogey," but have shown strong rallying power, and will doubtless present a firm front again as soon as the Bank rate has reached a point from which no further rise is to be feared. Even now it may be said that a 4 per cent. Bank rate is fully discounted in the various markets. The weakness of Spanish, and a sharp spasm in Ottoman Banks, were features in the foreign market; and South Americans generally have again reacted, the Brazilian trouble having made this department rather nervous. Comparative firmness has been displayed by West Australian mines, although a few disappointing developments have also arisen in this section; but as compared with the excellent results obtained quotations have now reached a moderate level, and the market will doubtless go ahead again in the near future. In the Industrial department promoters still show a good deal of activity. A Coventry Cycle Company is shortly to be floated, and I shall have something to say on this promotion in next week's issue. An important conversion will be also that of the Bovril Company, which will be undertaken by Mr. E. T. Hooley, of Dunlop Tyre fame.

Home Rails.

Had it not been for the nervousness concerning the Money Market, Home Railway stocks would probably have marked a distinct recovery, notwithstanding the continuance of unsettled weather. Market conditions are certainly more favourable, as the settlement showed a considerable reduction in the account open, rates being consequently very light. The fact that in spite of the attentions of Jupiter Pluvius a considerable traffic increase was shown for the week is certainly encouraging, and distinctly points to an improvement in trade still being in progress. The continued efflux of gold has, however, had a depressing influence, and so we see Brighton "A" again at 175¼, and Dover "A" at 99¾. The latter, I repeat, are in a most promising position in view of the steady progress made by the South-Eastern line, which showed again a traffic increase of £626 last week, notwithstanding the unfavourable atmospheric conditions. Although a Bank rate of 4 per cent. would, on the face of it, hardly justify present quotations of the Heavy stocks, their comparative scarcity at the settlement indicates that investment purchases have counteracted speculative realisations, and I doubt very much whether bonâ-fide holders will be inclined to part with their stocks, in view of the difficulty of finding suitable investments of equal safety and promise. The bucket-shop tip to buy Great Eastern has not caught on this time, and the price is back at 101⅜. The Scotch stocks, after a distinct rally on purchases from Glasgow, have become easier; but I still maintain that Caledonian Deferred (Coras) and North British Deferred are excellent value at present quotations, whatever temporary rise may occur in the Bank rate. Metropolitan Districts have again touched 34, and stand at 32⅜. A certain amount of stock has been delivered at the settlement, and a large take-up has further reduced the amount available in the market. The strong group who have taken this market in hand may at any moment engineer an important advance, and shareholders will do well to stick tight to their holdings, which should materially appreciate in capital value in the near future. An agitation has been initiated on the Stock Exchange in favour of dealing with the various classes of the Ordinary stock of the Sheffield Company, and a memorial has been addressed to the Company in favour of modifying the division. At present £100 Ordinary stock is divided into £50 Six per Cent. Preferred and £50 Deferred. The memorial urges that powers should be taken next session to split the Ordinary stock into £100 Three per Cent. Preferred and £50 Deferred, and to duplicate the amount of the existing "B" stock. There is something to be said in favour of the contention of the memorialists that an English Railway stock bearing 6 per cent. interest is altogether out of date, and that a 3 per cent. stock would command a relatively higher value than a 6 per cent. stock.

Yankee Rails.—On the Eve of the Election.

Indications have multiplied during the past week that the Presidential elections, which will take place in the United States in a fortnight's time, viz., on November 3, will result in an overwhelming victory for McKinley and the sound money party. According to news cabled from New York from the most reliable sources, the view which I took about a month ago will therefore be fully borne out. The estimates which I gave some time back have been more than confirmed by the statements made by Senator Quay, of Pennsylvania, on behalf of the National Republican Committee, which have been transmitted by cable. His view is that the election of Messrs. McKinley and Hobart to the Presidency and Vice-Presidency respectively is an accomplished fact. Mr. McKinley, he says, will receive 270 electoral votes and Mr. Bryan 110. Six States, having 67 votes are doubtful. The probabilities, however, all indicate that these 67 votes will go to the Republicans. Senator Quay adds:—"Two hundred and seventy votes are now assured to Mr. McKinley. This is the status to-day. We have the election and will hold it. Our present effort in the West is to this end only. The Opposition has abandoned the East." In addition to the improving political position the American market has been affected by the large gold shipments which have again been made to the States. These have caused weakness in the other markets, but were of course a "bull" point for Yankee Rails. There is, moreover, every prospect of their continuing, as the United States are in a position to draw all the necessary supplies of the yellow metal which they require from Europe, owing to the remarkable proportions which their exports to this side have attained. These again exceeded the imports during September by over 34,000,000 dols., grain shipments forming a very important item. Poor crops in Europe, and the complete failure of crops in India, have brought great relief to the American farmers, and tended considerably to help the finances of the country. Nor is it likely that gold shipments will stop after the election of McKinley as President. It is true that goods from Europe will probably be hurried forward to the States in order to escape the Protectionist tariff which will follow McKinley's victory; but on the other hand European investers and operators will take back some of the hundreds of millions of American securities which they returned to the Yankees during the last three or four years owing to financial crises and the fear of the country going on a silver basis. Simultaneously there will be created a demand for stocks and bonds, and American hoards of gold will be released. The real rise in Yankee Rails should, therefore, commence with the Presidential elections. Under these circumstances, any one investing in well-selected American Railroad stocks should have an excellent prospect of making a large profit. Personally I incline to the low-priced stocks, such as Erie Ordinary and Prefs., Southern Ordinary and Prefs., Denver Prefs., Norfolk Prefs., Atchison Prefs., &c., which are likely to yield large profits, while the risk is minimised. Louisville and Nashville have displayed a very strong front, and both as regards this road and the Southern Railway the announcement that the Seaboard Air Line will restore rates, not only within the jurisdiction of Judge Speer, but outside of it, has steadied the market for these stocks. There have been a good many "Bull" tips on Readings. As an American contemporary puts it, the price should advance, say the people who are "working the deal," because of the foreclosure sale, and to encourage the payment of future assessments. This with propriety might be called a negative "Bull" argument, as it really means the more you put in the less you take out. Efforts to advance Reading in the recent past have not been successful, because there always seemed to be an unlimited supply of the stock for sale whenever the price showed signs of strength. There will have to be a change in this state of things before Readings can score any important advance. Canadian Pacifics have reacted to 58⅜, partly in sympathy with the American market, partly on a bad traffic return, and there is no doubt that the rise in the German Bank rate has had a considerable effect, support for this stock having of late come almost entirely from Berlin. By the way, I have received another communication from Vancouver, B.C., which was written at the time when a huge strike of the Company's telegraphists and station-masters (the two offices being combined at most stations) was in progress, and with one or two exceptions every man was on strike between Montreal and Vancouver. The interruption of business on Canada's one highway is described as most disastrous by my correspondent, who is much opposed to the Canadian Pacific owing to the monopoly possessed by the Company, which he complains it does not use for the benefit of the country. My correspondent also mentions that the Canadian Pacific hope to obtain by money grants or by State Guaranteed Loan at a low interest no less than 5,000,000 dols., in order to facilitate the building of a new railway link in British Columbia through the Rockies and East Kootenay. This line would shorten by some 300 miles the trans-Continental route of the Canadian Pacific, and would tap at about the Crow's Nest Pass some of the finest coal measures of the world, while, of course, serving the new goldfield. What the writer more particularly insists upon is that the new branch should not pass uncontrolled by the State under the management of the Canadian Pacific, so as not to place Western Canada still further at the mercy of a single Board of Railway Directors. The Grand Trunk meeting passed off satisfactorily. The statements made by the President, Sir Charles Rivers Wilson, and by the Vice-President, Mr. Joseph Price, were not calculated to arouse any enthusiasm; but the contention of the President that, with the triumph of sound financial principles in the United States, there will be a large revival of business, which will restore a great measure of prosperity to all the railroads of North America, may be accepted as truly describing the position. A reconstruction need not be feared at present, and Sir Charles Wilson held out the hope that when the Company had fully earned its fixed charges, with a fair prospect of continuing to earn them, some steps might be taken to deal with the accumulated deficit in conformity with precedence. Mr. Joseph Price established an interesting point with reference to the difference between an American mortgage and a Canadian debenture. In the case of the former it is a mortgage upon the corpus of the property, which can, if the interest is not paid, seize the corpus and sell it, and assess the junior securities. On the other hand, Canadian debentures are mortgages merely upon the income of the property. You cannot sell the property, and you cannot therefore assess the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway. This ought to relieve the minds of a good many holders of the junior securities of the Grand Trunk, some of whom have recently put this very same question to me.

Foreigners and South Americans.

As Paris is the real seat of the present disturbance in the Kaffir Circus, it is a foregone conclusion that interbourse securities should also have been flat. The discomfiture of a large speculator closely allied to leading financial firms, who have more than once helped him over the stile in the past, has apparently been followed by several minor collapses in South Africans, and to these troubles have to be added the precarious outlook for Spanish finance, and a spasm in Turks and Ottoman Banks. Spanish have now dropped to 57¾, and it is a wonder to me that with all the ill-fortune of the wars in Cuba and the Philippine Islands, they do not stand much lower still. The only chance of floating a loan successfully would be some success of the Spanish arms, and that seems to be as far off as ever. Other interbourse securities have suffered in sympathy, although Italians keep fairly steady. The scare in Ottoman Banks was caused by a rumour that a call would be made, which has, however, been officially denied. As a matter of fact, the decline in South African securities, in which that institution is heavily interested, and the precarious situation in Turkey, sufficiently account for the relapse. South Americans continue on the down-grade, chiefly under the influence of the adverse news from Rio de Janeiro, Brazilians having suffered a further fall. Argentines rallied at one time, but are again lower. The action of the new Mayor of Buenos Ayres in stating that in view of the condition of the municipal finances, he would have to suspend the service of the Debt, has made a very disagreeable impression. It is true that both President Uriburu and Dr. Romero, the Minister of Finance, have given assurances that the service of the Municipal Debt will be maintained; but there is evidently something wrong in Buenos Ayres. Dissatisfaction is also expressed that no effort is being made to carry out the unification of the Debt. It is evident that unless special steps are taken to obtain from the issuing houses in London some agreement as to the conversion, nothing will come of the matter for the present. Mexican Sixes and Uruguay bonds have eased off, although both these classes of securities deserve the attention of investors. Venezuela have improved on the reports that an agreement has been come to between this country and the United States on the boundary dispute.

The Kaffir Circus still Nervous.

The features of the mid-October settlement were heavy differences which have unfortunately had to be paid by speculators, and a largely reduced account; so that, notwithstanding the rise in the value of money, rates were easier than at the previous carry-over. The untold woes predicted by the "Bears" did not come about, and there was a comparative absence of failures which would be very encouraging, if it were not unfortunately an open secret that a number of jobbers have been helped over the stile, and that some of the brokers have not received their differences from a number of operators. Then, again, Paris is still on the selling tack, and the weak elements there have not been altogether eliminated. It is again that unfortunate and dangerous quartette of gambling counters, viz., Chartered of South Africa, Rand Mines, Limited, Consolidated Gold Fields and East Rands, which have accentuated the fall, and which are really at the bottom of the collapse in Paris. Unfortunately, so many people both here and in France have been tempted into these speculative stocks, that their discomfiture must necessarily affect those sound Transvaal gold mining shares which I have recommended to my readers. But I may place on record that ever since Chartered stood at 8½, Rand Mines, Limited at 45, East Rands at 12½, and Consolidated Gold Fields at 19, I have persistently, warned my readers to give them a wide berth; and now Chartered stand at 2 $\frac{7}{8}$, Rand Mines, Limited, at 24¼, East Rands at 4 $\frac{15}{16}$, and Consolidated Goldfields at 10⅝. The Consolidated Goldfields dividend, at the rate of 15s. per share on the Ordinary shares, making, with the interim distribution already made, 25s. per share for the year, proved more favourable than had been anticipated; but even the effect of this announcement was speedily lost in the stream of fresh sales which were forced from Paris. By the way, I do not consider the fact that the dividend was announced only after the carry-over had taken place, and some more unfortunate speculators were weeded out, as at all creditable; and it is to some extent a melancholy satisfaction that the insiders who bought on the eve of the announcement owing to privileged information did not reap any benefit, at least for the present. The results shown by the Consolidated Gold Fields Company are satisfactory in one respect as bearing upon the general outlook, and showing that considerable profits are still being made. The mining industry, moreover, in the Transvaal is progressing satisfactorily, and that is, after all, the chief point. As I anticipated, the strike of natives in the Witwatersrand mines was unimportant and confined to a few mines only, while latest advices are to the effect that the "boys" have returned to work. Another "bogey" which has been raised during the week has been the Sunday Closing measure; but latest advices are to the effect that the batteries will not be interfered with, and according to the assurance given by Mr. Joubert, the Minister of Mines of the Transvaal, he will make strong efforts on behalf of the Transvaal mining industry in the forthcoming November session of the Volksraad, and he seems sanguine of success. As the Boers have spent large sums on armaments and have thus greatly reduced their surplus, it is not likely that they will in any way injure that industry from which they draw their large revenue. It may be assumed that the crushings in the present month will be satisfactory, and the amount should be swollen by several new mines which have not of late been working. The Glencairn has of course stopped for some time, but, as I have already stated, the Porges Randfontein has re-commenced crushing. Knights have, moreover started crushing with sixty stamps, and thirty stamps have, been added to the ten previously at work on the Ginsberg. Either during this month or in November the Bonanza will have twenty more stamps at work, and in November the Van Ryn will commence crushing with eighty new stamps. Later on, end of the year, of course, a number of other stamps will be added, amongst which are no fewer than 140 stamps of the New Kleinfontein; and there will also be running in the more immediate future batteries of the New Spes Bona, the Glencairn, the North Randfontein, the Robinson Randfontein, the Van Ryn West, and the Paarl Central. We may thus look forward to gradually and surely increasing returns, and that these will finally have their effect upon prices in the Kaffir Circus cannot be doubted. The question is only when the weak elements are sufficiently shaken out for the big financiers to be able to give the market a permanent lift-up, which I am assured they are prepared to do. Knights have again been knocked about in sympathy with the gambling counters, and have fluctuated widely. There is absolutely no reason for the fall, and latest advices are satisfactory in every respect. I have already referred to the fact that the new battery is now at work. According to the mail information now to hand from Johannesburg, dated September 28, at that time already the 60-stamp mill was up and ready for the ore, whilst the foundations for the remaining sixty were nearly finished, and erection was being hurried on. It was hoped that the Siemens-Halske cyanide process would be completed by the end of September, and it was therefore expected that October would see production in full swing. The developments since July, at the rate then obtaining, should have amounted to some 40,000 tons; but the satisfactory work of the new compressor drill-plant has materially added to this rate, and a progressive increase may now be looked forward to. In this position there is certainly no reason for the relapse. Woodstock (Transvaal) have faced the surrounding weakness remarkably well, and are firm at $1\frac{3}{8}$. They are in the hands of a strong group, and, what is more, the news from the mine is exceedingly satisfactory. The position of the New Primrose is distinctly better, the main and middle reefs having been opened up to the twelfth level, while the North reef has also been cut. Results of the October crushings of the Porges Randfontein should also prove satisfactory and the new heavy stamps will doubtless give a good account of themselves, especially as the reef is rich. The Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Corporation has secured the issue of another loan of £50,000 of the Johannesburg Sanitary Board. It is evident, therefore, that business is going on while the market price is being depressed, and some day not far off there will be a sharp recovery in Johnnies. With reference to the Niekerk Gold Mining Company, the manager has forwarded to the Board assays by Mr. G. B. Frood, of Klerksdorp, certifying samples from No. 3 shaft as 2 oz. 2 dwt. 9 gr., and 2 oz. 17 dwt. 9 gr. It cannot be said that the statements made at the meeting of the African Gold Recovery Company were at all encouraging to the shareholders. The Company is engaged in very costly legislation, and it is needless to repeat that the rumour that a decision had been given in its favour by the Transvaal Courts was altogether unfounded. As regards the cyanide patents, the news that the application to amend the patent in New Zealand has been refused, although notice of appeal has been given, is also distinctly unfavourable. The Siemens-Halske electrical process for the treatment of tailings, moreover, is apparently making good progress on the Rand. Diamond shares have also been in the dumps, as so many holders of gold shares have also an assortment of diamond shares. De Beers are quoted $27\frac{1}{4}$, New Jagersfontein $8\frac{5}{8}$. New Bultfontein have been a steady market at $1\frac{3}{8}$, and I understand that another dividend announcement will shortly be made, this Company doing very satisfactory work.

Golden West Australia.

There have not been wanting disappointing incidents in the West Australian department; but upon the whole the news is excellent, and a number of mines will shortly fall into line with crushings. Developments on existing properties are also reported upon favourably, and as illustrating the progress which is being made by the leading mines I herewith give again the table of crushings from my contemporary the West Australian Review, brought up to mid-October:—

It will be seen that the Great Boulder and the Lake View both make a splendid showing, and with reference to the Lake View I may state that it will not be long ere the new batteries will bring up the output to a very large figure. The Mainland Consols is also showing well as a regular producer, and so are the Ivanhoe and Burbank's Birthday Gift. Market movements have partly been affected by renewed efforts of the "Bears" to depress quotations, but they have not succeeded to any extent, and prices even of the higher-priced shares may be said to have reached a very moderate level. The Great Boulder is again to the front with a crushing return of 709 tons for 2,031 oz., and there is certainly nothing in this yield to justify the decline to $6\frac{1}{2}$ which has taken place. From the Burbank's Birthday Gift mine a cable report is to hand, stating that a sample from the last tailings gave 30 dwt.

per ton, which is very satisfactory. Good general progress is also being made, according to the same cablegram which was despatched by Professor Nicholas. The Professor, too, cables with reference to the Gladiator Mine that the main shaft is down 216 ft., and that water is increasing. In No. 5 shaft, at a depth of 55 ft., he describes the reef as well defined, 5 ft. wide, and assaying 2 oz. per ton. I maintain my favourable view of Gladiators, of Burbank's Consols, and Burbank's North, all of which are under the management of Professor Nicholas. On the Lady Shenton developments are also favourable. The face is now in a large body, rich quartz stopes showing the usual first-class ore. One of the disappointments was that with reference to the Hit or Miss. A cablegram was received from Mr. J. Wilson Archibald, according to which, although the estimated valued of the ore is 3 oz., it is not possible to get out more than 20 dwt. through crushing. He, therefore, advises stopping the battery, and adding at once six pans and a tailings pump. It is evident, therefore, that, according to the Manager, the ore requires special treatment, the same as is the case with the Hannan's Brownhill; but it is strange that he did not find this out long ago. A heavy fall in the shares has taken place to $\frac{7}{8}$, but as apparently only a delay of a few months will be caused shareholders ought not to throw away their holdings. The West Australian Exploring and Finance group have as usual shown a strong front, amidst somewhat discouraging surroundings. Both London and Globe Finance and West Australian Exploring and Finance are not at the highest prices touched, but are still quoted $4\frac{5}{8}$ to $4\frac{7}{8}$; and I have not altered my opinion as to the important advance which must eventually take place. The Lake View Consols mine is doing well, and the approaching visit from Mr. Charles Kaufman, who has arrived in Paris, will no doubt afford an opportunity for the shareholders to learn from his own lips how valuable is their mine. Hannan's Golden Treasure and Golden Group have continued firm, and whenever the West Australian market takes a turn these should improve. Mr. Allen H. P. Stoneham's letter to the shareholders of the West Australian Gold Fields, Limited, the Hampton Plains Estate, Limited, and the West Australian Share Corporation, Limited, to which I referred last week, has created a favourable impression. It is true that West Australian Gold Fields have eased off to $6\frac{1}{2}$; but Hampton Plains are firm at $3\frac{3}{4}$-$\frac{7}{8}$, and the position of this Company is so promising that the shares will doubtless promptly recover the return of 4s. per share, which will shortly be deducted. In reply to several inquiries, I may mention that amongst the Stoneham group the following Mining shares appear to me specially suitable for investors, as being at moderate prices and likely to advance considerably, viz., Great Boulder Main Reef 10s. shares fully paid at $1\frac{3}{16}$, Mawson's Reward £1 shares at $\frac{15}{16}$, White Feather Reward £1 shares at $1\frac{15}{16}$, Cue No. 1 £1 shares at $\frac{9}{16}$, and Mount Margaret £1 shares at $1\frac{1}{2}$. Any one making up a little trust of these Mining shares should have an excellent chance of reaping a considerable profit. I should also think that Lady Shenton, Robinson, and East Murchison will give good accounts of themselves. Further fluctuations have taken place in West Australian (Gold District) Trading shares; but after the severe relapse the trend of prices seems to be in the upward direction, the Ordinary shares being quoted $\frac{5}{8}$, the Founders' shares £35. A cablegram from the general manager in Western Australian, announcing a number of further agencies taken over by the Company, is as follows:—"Purchase completed Moylan's business, Fremantle, embracing following agencies: Gilbey's wines and spirits, Bass's bottled ales and Guinness's stout, Bulldog brand bottled by Porter, Apollinaris, Geisler champagne, Bernard Scotch ale, Misa sherry, Antonio-de-Silva port—all colony monopolies." Golden Link Consolidated have been largely sold against the old shares, the price having receded to $\frac{5}{8}$; but a recovery is probable when the sales come to an end. From the Londonderry we have at last a favourable cablegram stating that the main shaft is down 320 ft., that quartz is coming in from the east, which is, in all probability, the main reef, and that the gold-bearing quartz is of better quality than that at the last level. If one could be sure that the management was now in good hands, this cablegram would be exceedingly promising; for it should not be forgotten that many experts who have in the past been on the property are still retaining the view that the Londonderry will, after all, prove a paying mine. I mentioned last week that Lord Fingall had made a new departure with reference to the disposal of his promotion profits out of the formation of Australia United. I am informed that Mr. Myring is also acting up to his promises, and there is still a very strong hope that, when the matter comes before the court, the late Colonel North's proportion of profits will be ordered to be devoted to the object for which the Colonel intended them, viz., to recoup the Londonderry shareholders. There is therefore a good deal of hope for the Londonderry, and shareholders will do well not to throw away their holdings, even though the sanguine anticipations entertained on the formation of the Company cannot be fulfilled. The news from the Murchison New Chum, conveyed to the shareholders at last week's meeting, was by no means comforting. Efforts are being made to get upon pay ore again, but for the present the reef seems to have pinched out. I have to announce the fact that the London and Colonial Exploration and Finance Company, of which Sir Somers Vine was to be the Chairman, was stillborn. The subscriptions were so meagre that the Directors are about to return the money. It is evident that the name of Sir Somers Vine is not one to conjure with.

Indian, New Zealand, and Other Mines.

Although the surroundings are generally very unsatisfactory, the Indian section has braced up again, and the favourable September results would certainly justify a further improvement. Nundydroog have advanced, and Mysore Gold are firmer on the declaration of a dividend of 7s., which, with the dividend of 6s. already declared, makes 13s. per share for the year. It is not surprising, therefore, that Mysore Gold should stand at $8\frac{13}{16}$. Goldfields of Mysore are firmer at 21s., and it must not be forgotten that the cyanide process is now at work there, so that at the end of the month we may expect some very favourable news, which might put up the price very considerably. In Australian shares other than West Australian Aladdin's Lamp have at last advanced to 3, the excellent returns and dividends beginning to tell. Amongst Charters Towers shares, an improvement has occurred in New Queen, Mill's Day Dawn United, and Bonnie Dundee; but Day Dawn P.C. are lower. The Croydon Goldfield is getting into high favour, on the splendid results obtained by the Croydon Consols. The following reports have been received by Elmslie, Limited:—By mail—"Clean-up of 265 tons gave gold of gross value of £3,998. 11s. 8d. Output of ore is now too much for the ten head of stamps." By cable, October 12—"New 15-head battery up on Company's mine now started, and running very well. Crushing regularly; 1,200 tons of ore at grass, and large output weekly. Expect to pay dividend in November of 1s. per share—60 per cent. per annum." Thus the 1s. dividend which I predicted three weeks ago is now officially declared to be assured, and it is not surprising that the shares have advanced to 10s. 6d., with every prospect of a further important rise. North Croydon Consols have also improved to 3s. 6d. to 3s. 9d. According to latest advices, the shaft is now down about 150 ft., and should cut the Croydon Consols lode at about 200 ft. In New Zealand mines declines are marked in Taitapu, Hauraki, Kapanga, and Waitekauri Central, but Thames Hauraki, Woodstock, and Waitekauri have improved. Business in this section is, however, on a small scale. In the general foreign section Rio Tinto have fluctuated, being adversely affected by the weakness of the Paris Bourse. De Lamar, La Yesca, and Burma Ruby have advanced, but St. John del Rey, Palmarejo, Frontino, and Golden Feather are lower. Grand Central (Mexico) have been distinctly firmer, after the temporary reaction caused by the special settlement.

An Easy Way to Speedy Fortune.

The above is the title of a pamphlet issued by Cunliffe, Russel, & Co., of 10, Place de la Bourse, Paris, in which this firm advocates the purchase of Foreign Lottery bonds, which they describe as "good, sound, and perfectly safe securities, not generally accessible to British investors, but which are great favourites on the Paris Stock Exchange." I have frequently explained that these bonds in many cases are in the receipt of only very small interest, that in others they receive no interest whatever, and that their chief attraction is the element of chance introduced by the drawings of the bonds. Now and then a holder may have the good luck to have one of his bonds drawn, but the motto of Cunliffe, Russel, & Co., "An easy way to speedy fortune," is in no way justified. At all events that enterprising firm do not by any means facilitate the acquisition of a speedy fortune by others by the methods they employ, whatever effect these may have on their own fortune. Curiously enough my attention has just now been drawn to the doings of this firm by the letter of a correspondent, who evidently wanted to do them a good turn. This communication was as follows:—

> In 1892 I attacked Cunliffe, Russel, & Co., of Paris, in your columns—it is only fair that I should call your attention to a creditable showing in their last pamphlet. They ask £122 15s. for a set of six different City of Paris Lottery Bonds. On inquiring at my brokers I find that they would cost me (with brokerage) £122, so that for 15s. one gets the lists of drawn bonds twenty-four times a year besides special advices of drawings.

This apparent conversion of one of my correspondents to the view that Cunliffe, Russel, & Co. are philanthropists struck me as so strange, that I forthwith investigated the latest circulars of that firm. I am sorry to say that the result is not so satisfactory as my correspondent, from motives best known to himself, apparently wished to convey. It is true that the price quoted by Cunliffe, Russel, & Co. for City of Paris bonds pretty closely approaches the market price, but I have never in the past noticed any great discrepancy regarding the quotations of these bonds in that firm's circulars. The fact is that there is a considerable market in these, so that it would presumably be somewhat dangerous to quote excessive prices. The result of a comparison of the quotations of Cunliffe, Russel, & Co. with the actual market prices in Paris, as supplied to me by a respectable firm of foreign bankers in London, will be gathered from the following little table:—

Bonds.	Market Price in Paris.	Price quoted by Cunliffe, Russel, & Co.
Ottoman bonds	£4 0 0	£9 0 0
Panama, ,, ...	5 17 6	8 0 0
Congo ,, ...	3 7 6	5 10 0
Servian ,, ...	2 17 6	4 10 0
Paris, 1869 ,, ...	17 15 0	18 5 0
,, ,, 1886 ,, ...	16 7 6	17 15 0
Combination of 3 bonds ...	13 5 0	22 0 0
,, 4 ,, ...	16 2 6	26 0 0
,, 7 ,, ...	30 0 0	50 0 0
,, 14 ,, ...	60 0 0	100 0 0
,, 69 ,, ...	289 7 6	500 0 0

The combinations of bonds consist of precisely the bonds on which Cunliffe, Russel, & Co. levy a very heavy profit, viz., Ottoman, Panama, Congo, and Servian bonds, and, looking at the enormous profit added to the market prices of these, it strikes me as not improbable that the smallness of the extra charge made on the City of Paris bonds is merely an amiable little trick to make the other bonds go down at the high prices. The remark has also been made to me that it is difficult to understand how Cunliffe, Russel, & Co. can sell genuine Paris 1875-76 bonds, with October 15 coupon attached, at £23, as offered in their circulars. Again, the statement made by them that every bond of the Ottoman loan of 1870 must draw at least £16 is incorrect, as the Turkish bonds are only paid at 58 per cent. of the nominal amount. Thus, a bond drawn of frs. 400 is only paid with frs. 232, or about £9. 2s. 6d. This, however, merely by the way. The comparative table drawn up by me shows that "the way to fortune" is not exactly made easier by the philanthropists of the Place de la Bourse, and that any one desirous to make his or her fortune in this way had better buy the bonds in the market through some other channel.

New Enterprises and Issues.

The prospectuses of the following new Companies and issues have been placed before the public during the week:—

The Central Queensland Land Corporation, Limited.—This Corporation has been formed for the purpose of acquiring the practical monopoly of land in the district of Gladstone, Port Curtis (Central Queensland). The capital is fixed at £120,000 in shares of £1 each and 1,600 4½ per cent. Debentures of £50 each.

The property now owned by this Company is of large extent and is in a rising and promising position, Port Curtis being considered one of the finest harbours on the coast of Queensland. Sufficient land is already let to pay the Debenture interest twice over. The present issue is for the purpose of acquiring further blocks of land, which will, in the natural course of things, greatly increase in value. This Company has, I think a promising future before it.

Worsley's, Limited.—This Company has been formed to acquire and carry on the whole of the businesses of the vendor, a furnishing contractor, of Manchester, Bradford, and London. The share capital is £75,000, divided into 3,750 Seven per Cent. Preference and 3,750 Ordinary shares of £10 each.

I cannot see anything very enticing in this issue. The item of profit, estimated at £1,500, from "increased discounts obtainable from the larger purchasing power of the Company," must be rather problematical. It is not likely to be made if the business merely continues to yield present returns. Should these fall off there would be no chance of such additional revenue. I think investors can do better in other concerns.

Harmsworth Brothers, Limited.—This Company is formed for the purpose of purchasing and carrying on the business of Periodical and Magazine Proprietors, Publishers, and Printers, founded by Mr. Alfred C. Harmsworth, and now known as Harmsworth Brothers. The capital is fixed at £1,000,000 divided into 500,000 Five per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares and 500,000 Ordinary shares of £1 each. The present issue is of the preference shares.

The Bagot Pneumatic Tyre Company, Limited.—This Company is formed to acquire the patent rights for England and elsewhere of an improved pneumatic tyre, a detachable puncture proof band for use with pneumatic tyres, and an improved non-return lock valve to use with pneumatic tyres. The capital is fixed at £200,000 in shares of £1 each.

I understand that the great point of the tyre is that it will not slip whether half or fully inflated, and that it is only half an inch on the ground. This latter advantage reduces the liability to puncture to a minimum, and increases the speed, especially on inclines. As regards the possibility of puncturing, this is also provided against by the second patent, the detachable puncture-proof band. There seems to be good reason to believe that the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company will adopt a conciliatory attitude towards this new Company, and will certainly not attack it, while the fact that the Bagot Company may prove a serious competitor renders it not improbable that some agreement between the two Companies will eventually be arrived at. Under these circumstances, investors in the Company would obviously have the chance of seeing the shares at a considerable premium, whenever some such arrangement is come to.

The Mexican Cotton Estates of Tlahualilo.—This Company was formed in 1890 to acquire and develop the Tlahualilo Cotton Estates, situate in the Laguna District in the State of Durango, Northern Mexico, together with the franchises, concessions, water rights, &c. This is an issue of £350,000 Six per Cent. First Mortgage Debentures of £100 each at par.

This may be considered a sound industrial undertaking. The share capital is £286,000, while undivided profits to the extent of £119,372, and temporary loans amounting to £62,920 have been expended in developments, making in all an invested capital of £468,292. The property is large in extent and situated in a healthy and temperate climate. The profits in 1895-6 amounted to

£64,512, or three times the amount required to pay the interest on the sum required, while the temporary loans are to be repaid out of this issue, thus strengthening the financial position of the Company. Some further remarks upon the Mexican industrial outlook will be found under "Various Investments."

Sumatra-Singapore Coal Company.—This Company has been formed to acquire concessions and work coal deposits in a large tract of land in the province of Indragiri, Sumatra. The capital is £60,000 in £1 shares.

There is nothing in this venture to recommend it to English investors. No work appears to have been done on the property, except the prospecting for the purpose of the Prospectus, and it will be as well to wait until the property is properly opened up.

The City of Birmingham Tramways Company, Limited.—This Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring tramways in the City of Birmingham and neighbourhood, and for development of the system within that area. The capital is fixed at £1,000,000 in Preference and Ordinary shares of £5 each.

The fact of the inhabitants of Brum allowing two promoters from Canada to step in to engineer this venture does not speak much in its favour. It is well known in the town that the tramways have not been the financial success expected, and there does not appear to be any fresh inducements for investors to subscribe to this concern.

William Cory & Son, Limited.—This Company has been formed to acquire, amalgamate, and carry on as one concern the English businesses of Messrs. W. Cory & Son, Lambert Bros., D. Radford & Co., Beadle Bros. Limited, J. and C. Harrison, Green, Holland & Sons, Mann, George & Co., and G. J. Cockerell & Co., Limited, coal factors, coal and coke merchants and contractors, lightermen, &c. The share capital is £2,000,000, divided into 170,000 Five per Cent. Preference shares of £5 each, and 230,000 Ordinary shares of a like amount. The present issue is of 170,000 Preference shares, and £800,000 Four per Cent. First Mortgage Debenture stock at £103.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

A Bondholder of Costa Rica and Argentina.—The Argentine unification scheme is now awaiting any measures which may be taken by the Argentine Government to make it effective. It is supposed that Dr. Pelligrini has left for London on a financial mission. It is in the first instance necessary that the financial houses connected with the Customs Loans should be settled with as to the figures at which these will rank in the conversion. As regards Costa Rica, I have done my best to impress upon that defaulting Government to come to a settlement, but there is nothing for it but patience. Chin Chin.—A fair investment. Mona.—I cannot understand your talk. I have been perfectly correct in anticipating a relapse in gilt-edged securities, and I look for a further decline. On the other hand, the more speculative stocks are more promising, and I do not for one moment share your opinion that Bryan will be successful in the States. Archipelago.—1. I do not advise investment in Portuguese, more especially now that Brazilians have collapsed. The financial position in Brazil has for some time been very bad. 2. Very speculative, but promising. 3. No understanding has so far been arrived at. 4. Yes, it would be advisable to make the exchange. 5. The Argentine Funding Loan.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

Anxious, Belsize-road.—You might put the money into the new Uruguay loan and into the Mexican Cotton Estates Six per Cent. First Mortgage Sterling Debentures referred to by me last week under "Various Investments." This would give you even a better return than you ask for. A. M.—You do not appear to be a regular reader of Truth, or else you would know that I have already plainly stated that I do not approve of the system of the "Monaco Secured Deposit Co-operation." I advise you to have nothing to do with it. R. D., Lymington.—In the matter of touting circulars it is always necessary to be cautious. I have the very worst possible opinion of the attempt to interest the clergy in the English Church and General Permanent Building Society. Femme.—I do not advise investment in undertakings of this kind which are formed for the benefit of the clergy. Tarts.—As requested, I forward in your envelope the name of a smart firm of City solicitors. These outside brokers should be at once compelled to pay up. G. J. R. M.—I advise you to have nothing whatever to do with the outside concern in question. W. B. M.—I cannot advise on the solvency of stockbrokers. Springfield—There appears to me no reason for present uneasiness; but I do not think that these bank deposits are very satisfactory. It is preferable to invest the money in sound securities. Oscar.—These German lotteries are bonâ-fide, but the money generally sticks to the fingers of the intermediaries, and I do not recommend this sort of gamble. I cannot reply by letter. J. A., Dublin.—Have nothing to do with these outside dealers; you will only lose your money. A. H.—You cannot be a regular reader of Truth, or else you would know that I do not advise dealings with syndicate touts such as J. Edwards & Co., of Talbot House, Arundel-street, W.C. Inquirer, Barnard Castle.—One of the leading Australian banks. No reason for anxiety.

Home Rails.

A Poor Man.—I am not an admirer of Great Northern "A" stock, as there is absolutely no speculative market in it, and therefore it is not a stock to speculate in. After the heavy fall you had better hold. S. N.—Certainly hold Dover "A" and "Coras."

American and Foreign Rails.

Alabama.—Yes, Alabama Midland Five per Cent. Gold bonds are suitable for permanent investment, and should be held. J.T.F.—I think that the investment in all these stocks would be rather risky, considering you want your money back in February or March. Uruguay bonds would be profitable, or the Six per Cent. debentures of the Mexican Cotton Estates. L.H.—No reason to sell any of the three bonds in question. The Grand Trunk Company is apparently turning the corner.

Mining Shares.

Bristol Blackboy.—I am afraid that this is a very doubtful venture, and I do not look for an early improvement. Excelsior.—1. I have repeatedly stated that I do not like Empress of Coolgardie. 2. I do not think much of Brownhill Proprietary. 3. Hold for an improvement. J. McI.—Amongst the shares mentioned by you Hannan's Napier (4) are the most promising. With reference to the others I must refer you to my remarks under "Golden West Australia." Virtute Viresco.—I should advise you to keep the Indian gold mining shares Nos. 1 to 3 for a rise. You should certainly keep Randfontein, and buy more to average. West Australian Exploring and Finance (5) will go much higher, and you should buy more. North Croydon Consols (6) are promising, and so are Johannesburg Consolidated Investment (7). I do not think much of Bantjes (8), and do not like No. 9. Breffini.—1. I should advise you to leave Sheba Queens alone; they are being promiscuously offered by outside dealers. 2. Very doubtful. 3. Waterfall Estates should be held for an advance. 4. Only if they pay at least 10s. in the £. Douglas Dick.—I do not see how I can help you. It is for the shareholders to take the necessary steps. Tim.—It seems to me that the Freehold Goldfields of Queensland, Limited, is a very doubtful concern; and as I have never recommended it I can only return you the document. Woodcock.—1. Yes, I still think that Hendersons will recover again, and you should hold for a more important improvement. 2. No reason to sell any of the shares mentioned under this number. G. J. M.—I can only refer you to my remarks in last week's issue, under "Mr. Barnato on the Position," and I advise you to hold your Johnnies. Cigarette.—The remarks made in last week's issue, under the heading of "Mr. Barnato on the Position," will answer your question. Falcon:—There is a fair prospect that something will be done for the Londonderry shareholders by Lord Fingall, Mr. T. H. Myring, and the executors of the late Colonel North. Hold your shares. S. W. J., Surbiton.—Hold West Australian Exploring and Finance (1), and buy more, as a big rise is coming. This also applies to No. 2 (London and Globe Finance). Nos. 3 and 4 are promising, and so is No. 6 (Hampton Plains); hold for a rise. No. 5 is a fair investment. Salpinx.—1. Lake View Consols look very promising, and are likely to go higher. 2. The dividend on the new shares has yet to be declared. 3. Yes, permanently. Anxious, Pall Mall.—The future of this mine will more or less depend upon the results obtained from the Wealth of Nations, the adjoining property. Brixtonian.—I should think that it would be advisable to hold the first-named shares, and also the others, for an improvement. You should number your inquiries in future. —H. G., Harlesden.—I must leave you to take your own decision, as I should not care to accept any responsibility in the matter. Benachie.—No option but to hold your mining shares Nos. 1 to 5 for a general rally; although I do not like Sam's Wealth of Nations (1) or Consolidated Gold Trust of London, Paris, and Brussels (5) at all. C. H. D.—I should think that Goldfields of Mysore ought to reach a much higher price. Leominster.—A is a fair mining risk, but I do not think much of B. Harvey.—If you are a shareholder you must have received the circular of the Directors of the Wealth of Nations mine, and thus can form your own opinion. Corrigenda.—No option but to hold both shares for a rise. E. L. R.—A promising Mining Company; hold for an advance. Technical.—I do not advise purchase of Sam's Wealth of Nations, and have repeatedly said so when the shares were at a higher level than they are now. E. L.—You should not take these shares up, as they can be bought much lower in the market. Mersey Tunnel.—1. The office is at 2, Birchin-lane, London, E.C., and the agent is Mr. T. H. Roberts. 2. Yes. 3. The Holcomb Valley will come along in time. Constant Reader, Constantinople.—(i.) These shares have fallen in sympathy with the general slump, and should be held. (ii.) This means "ex rights." (iii.) Nothing but the general depression. (iv.) Not yet. Golf.—A fair mining risk, but you could have sold at a very high price. Medicus.—No reason to sell your mining shares; hold, and buy more Johnnies to average. Doubtful.—Hold, but do not buy more to average. Mines.—I do not advise purchase of most of the low-priced mines, Nos. 1-18, mentioned by you. Nos. 10 and 11 might perhaps do, but you can make a far better selection from my letter. For instance, Hampton Plains, Mount Margarets, Mawsons, White Feather Reward, Cue 1, and Great Boulder Main Reef are promising amongst West Australians, and amongst South Africans Langlaagte Estate, Randfontein, and Johnnies. Fiat Lux.—No reason to sell as already mentioned by you, but do not average yet. London and Globe and West Australian Exploring and Finance will go much higher. Sigma.—1. Yes, at about par. 2. Hold Randfontein, and buy more to average. Redcar.—I do not approve of the West Australian Minerals and Finance Company. Of course, if you do not pay calls on shares they are liable to forfeiture. Aliquid.—You should hold your West Australian shares Nos. 1-4 for a recovery. Thanks for your information as to Day. Anne Barnum.—If you are a holder of Wentworth Proprietary, you had better hold now. Inflator.—1. Better join the reconstruction, and sell after. 2. Hold for a recovery. 3. Eventually something will be done for this Company. Probably another property will be given to it. Expectation.—It has not yet been distributed, and evidently it is advisable to await better times. Glencar.—No option but to hold; it is a promising Company. Allowance.—1. Yes. 2. Yes, eventually. 3. One of these days. No option but to hold Nos. 4-9 until the depression passes from the Mining market. 10. Yes, London and Globe Finance are a good purchase for a rise. P. W.—No option but to hold through the prevailing depression. Wat.—Yes, amongst the shares mentioned you might buy Barnato Consols (1), Buffelsdoorn (2), Randfontein (3), Glencairn (7), and Langlaagte Star (8). Hold Woodstock (Transvaal) for a rise. Crampton.—1. London and West Australian Exploration shares are not one of my recommendations; but when Mr. Moreing returns they should recover. 2. No, hold Randfontein. Tyke.—1. Hold for a recovery. 2. Quite so, but I never recommended North Boulder at the high prices. I am glad you made so handsome a profit on my advice. D. L. R.—Yes, buy more to average. Langlaate Star. Hold the other shares. Richard K.—1. Hold, but do not buy more to average. 2. Hold for a rise. R. M. S.—The position is somewhat doubtful, but I think you should hold. Mons Meg.—1. No, crushing is not yet so far advanced, but prospects are excellent. Hold Hannan's Golden Treasure and Group. 2. No reason to sell. Hold Gladiators (3) for a rise. I do not think much of Nos. 4 and 5. Surveyor, Clapham.—1. Hold these West Australian shares for a rise. 2. No option but to hold for a recovery. 3. Hold. Tadpole.—I. Hold Barnato Consols, and disregard all the irresponsible talk. The general depression is responsible for the decline. II. Yes, certainly hold. Y. J. T.—Be careful and deal only through members of the Stock Exchange. Cotton.—Hold all your shares Nos. 1 and 2. The uncertainties of mining apply, of course, to No. 3. Please yourself. As regards No. 4, I still retain very favourable views of Hannan's Golden Treasure and Golden Group. 5. The explanation has been fully made in the financial papers. Croydon Consols are up at 10s. 6d. now. Croydon.—1. Hold for the present; you will no doubt get a better price eventually. 2. Not yet. 3. Yes, certainly hold Oceana Consolidated. 4. As a matter of principle I cannot recommend individual stockbrokers. J. McI.—No, I do not consider Nos. 1-3 worth buying now. You can do better by making your selection from the shares mentioned in my letter. S. W. J.—A fair mining risk, but no catch. Coalville—1. A promising Company; hold. 2. A fair mining risk. 3. Johnnies, Barnato Consols, Randfontein, and Langlaagte Estate. Millhead) Glasgow.—You must be aware that I have warned my readers often against East Rands and Anglo-French Exploration. There may, however, be a recovery. Hopeful.—I cannot advise on the solvency of stockbrokers. I repeat I do not like the Broad Arrow Mine. The other shares should be held on the chance of a recovery. Puzzled.—1. The position of the Hit or Miss Mine has been fully explained by the Directors. 2. Not yet. 3. Yes. 4. No, I do not approve of Lisbon-Berlyn. Leave Nos. 5-8 alone for the present. Luke.—No option but to hold both shares for an improvement, which is probable. Thanks for the compliment. Burgess.—1. You will have read the report of the meeting, at which full information was afforded. 2. I do not care for the Scottish Colonial. Halifax.—1. Hold Barnato Banks, and buy more Johnnies' Consols. to average them. 2. No. 3 and 4 should be left alone. Cat.—One of these days they will no doubt recover. Hold.

Hewetsons, Tottenham Court-road, London, send their Illustrated Catalogue post free, and it is acknowledged to be the best Furnishing Guide extant.

Industrial Shares.

J. B. 5.—A fair investment, but no catch. You ought to be able to hear more about this local concern in Glasgow. Boss.—Very speculative, but promising, especially now that the full licence has been granted. Hew.—Yes; you had better sell at once, and clear your profit. Other opportunities are now cropping up. W. H. Lennox.—I cannot give you any information about the Wallis Chlorine Syndicate, Limited, and it is not a Company in which I should advise investment. Brum.—This is a local Irish concern, about which no information is available here. Write to the Secretary for information. Poor Widow.—Bovril might be advisable as a very promising, if speculative, investment, but not the other share. Layer.—1. It boots not to speculate on such possibilities. The Silverites are not likely to win. 2. No. Cool Comfort.—Unless you can prove legally misrepresentation in the prospectus you cannot avoid the calls. It means going to law. It is a great pity that you did not heed my warning about this concern.

Mixed Investments.

Pearl.—All your mining shares, No. 1 to 5, are well selected, and should be held for a rise. You should also certainly hold the American bonds, as matters in the States are shaping themselves favourably. Border.—1. No; I do not like the New Beeston Cycle Company at all. 2. No; I do not approve of the Midland Fire Insurance Corporation, or the policy adopted by it. R. S. P.—You have bought British Chartered shares of South Africa altogether against my advice, but I think at present you should hold them for a recovery. This also applies to the other shares mentioned. G. R. J.—Some of the industrial shares held by you, especially No. 4, are very speculative. The others might be held for the present, and on No. 7 (Bovril) you will no doubt make a large profit. Sell No. 9 when you have a fair profit. E. L.—Please note in future that I cannot answer two letters in the same week. Amongst the mining shares mentioned I consider Langlaagte Block B and Langlaagte Star the best purchases. Instead of the other mining shares, you will do well to consult my remarks under "the Kaffir Circus" and "Golden West Australia." Dover "A" are a far better purchase than Great Eastern. Inkstand.—I should advise you to have nothing to do with Sheba Qeeens. The railway line in question has not yet been finished, and unless you can get the shares at a low price I advise you not to buy them at present. Bart, Bournemouth.—Amongst the shares mentioned by you there are a good many which I should not have advised you to buy; but in the present condition of the South African market it would be better to hold all for a recovery and then to consider which to sell. The industrial shares Nos. 1 to 3 are no catch. A. B., West Hampstead.—I do not think the time to average Perus has come yet, neither do I recommend a further purchase of the mining shares at present. Navy.—1. I do not think much of the bank shares in question, although they are fair value. 2. Perhaps you had better hold for the present. Hold also the mining shares, which should recover. You will find all these mining shares quoted in the Financial News; the daily papers pay very little attention to them. Ilex.—No particular reason to sell No. 1, but you might perhaps clear your profit on No. 2. Hold Nos. 3 and 4. The charge made for selling Great Eastern Railway stock is monstrous, and you should not submit to it. There is no book of the kind. Kent.—Prospects are fair, but all depends upon the issue of the Presidential elections in November. You can insist to see the register of shareholders at the offices of the Company, on proving that you are a shareholder and on payment of a small amount. R.I.—No reason to sell the American Bonds No. 1 now. 2. Nothing is known here about such American Savings Banks. R.A.—1. Only if you can obtain inside knowledge of their business. 2. No, I do not advise purchase of Chartered of South Africa shares. Tyre.—1. The business was taken over after the publication of the prospectus. I have made no favourable statement on the Company, and do not expect a rise as yet. 2. No option but to hold for a recovery. Naddah.—1. No option but to hold the Mining Shares. 2. Buenos Ayres Western Deferred are a fair investment. 3. High enough. A. E. B.—No option but to hold Nos. 1 and 3. I do not think much of Nos. 2 and 4. Rimrod.—1. You must tell me what class of investments you require and what yield. 2. A fair investment. Larochc.—1. A fair security but no catch. 2. This Chinese loan is a good investment. Hibernian.—1. No, leave them alone now. 2. Yes, French Dunlops are a good investment. 3. Knights and Langlaagte Estate are promising. A. T. C.—1. No fresh information available, but you should hold. 2. I do not like it at all. Harp.—No reason to sell Nos. 1 and 2. I should not buy No. 3 just now. No. 4 is a fair investment; Nos. 5 and 6 had better be held now. Rednorth.—No reason to sell No. 1, although it is a fluctuating business. Sell Nos. 2 and 3. I do not like Van den Bergh Margarine. No option but to hold the mining shares Nos. 5-7. Johnnes, Clifton.—It is a pity that you did not sell out of the Diamond shares when I advised their sale at the time they stood at a high price. I will see if I can do anything in the matter. Heaton.—I see no special reason for selling the Debenture No. 1. All your Australian and South African Mining shares are well selected and are bound to rise to a higher value. Hold for a recovery.

The Tricks of the Syndicate Touts.

The proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court are sometimes exceedingly instructive, and they were so more particularly on the occasion of the public examination of James Pickup Law, who once upon a time carried on the business of a Syndicate tout at the Clock House, Arundel-street, Strand, London, W.C., under the name of J. P. Law. I repeatedly warned my readers against having any dealings with this person, and how fully justified these warnings were is proved by the admissions of the bankrupt, whose liabilities were £5,085 against assets of £12. He says that he started at the suggestion of W. E. Ungless, who provided £30 capital, and who, by the way (as my readers are aware), was also the proprietor of that notorious syndicate-touting shop of Cameron, Muir, & Co. Ungless was a few weeks ago sentenced at the Central Criminal Court to eighteen months' hard labour for obtaining credit to the extent of £20 without disclosing the fact that he was an undischarged bankrupt. What I am more particularly concerned with in the present instance is the admission of James Pickup Law that when they obtained clients by advertising and circularising, no stock was actually purchased, and the cover which was sent was simply placed to their banking account. As a matter of fact, no syndicates were ever opened, although the circulars sent out by the firm advised the purchase of certain stocks in anticipation of a rise. In a few instances their advice proved to be good, and as a result they were hard hit themselves. They had only the cover to fall back upon to pay the differences, and their only chance of making a profit was when their advice proved to be bad. These candid admissions only bear out what I have always said about these syndicate touts. Whether the stocks in which they pretend to open syndicates go up or down, they never buy or sell. They simply pocket the subscriptions, and if the stocks go down they inform the subscribers of the fact that the money has been lost. If the stocks go up they do not pay up, and if the clients press them they go into the Bankruptcy Court. But this is not all; James Pickup Law also admits that, "relying upon human nature," they allowed a man to win at first in order to make him increase the amount of his stake. This is an old dodge which I exposed some years ago under the heading of "Confessions of an outside Broker." Is it necessary to again warn my readers against the clumsy dodges of these syndicate-touts? It is, of course, impossible that TRUTH should reach every foolish country investor, but I am surprised that sometimes even readers of TRUTH should ask me the question whether they should deal with certain syndicate touts, and what I thought of their circulars. Surely they need but read my article to know that all these tempting circulars ought to find their way into the waste-paper basket, and that the syndicate tout should be avoided like the pest!

VARIOUS INVESTMENTS.

The further hardening of the Money Market, which will probably be followed by an advance in the Bank rate this week, has naturally affected gilt-edged stocks adversely. In the first instance Consols have suffered, declining to 108. Indian Three and a Half per Cent. stock has followed with a decline to 116½, the Three per Cent. stock to 106½. Colonial bonds and British Corporation stocks are following suit, and I should not be at all surprised if this decline should make further progress. It would certainly be more justified than any further relapse in the second and third-class stocks, which, while more speculative, have all along remained at proportionately much lower levels. Silver has recovered slightly to 30$\frac{1}{16}$d., but a further fall seems quite on the cards, as the Silverites in the United States are expected to come a cropper. The prospective famine in India is also an unfavourable point. Rupee paper has lost ⅞ at 60, for similar reasons. In Cycle shares a fair amount of dealings has taken place, and Beestons at one time touched 5⅛ on rumours of another big deal, but have now reacted to 4⅝. Dunlops are firmer, the Deferred being quoted 1⅜, but the Ordinary remain at 1¼. Humbers are the turn easier, the Ordinary at 1$\frac{7}{16}$, the Prefs. at 1$\frac{1}{16}$. Cycle Tubes remain at ⅞, but Cycle Components have been somewhat firmer at 3¾. A considerable amount of dealings have taken place in Clément, Gladiator and Humber (French), Limited, dubbed by the market Gladiators, at ⅛ to ¼ premium, and a fresh advance is looked for. Brewery shares have been inactive. Allsopps have declined to 167½, and Guinness' Ordinary to 520. I see that the shareholders of Gray & Gilbert, Limited, are offered the return of their money by the Directors, and they have thus the choice either to keep the shares or not. I referred last week to the Mexican Cotton Estates of Tlahualilo, the prospectus of which has since been placed before the public. It will be gathered from the same that the issue of £350,000 Six per Cent. First Mortgage Debentures of £100 each at par is amply secured, the profits shown for the year ending May 31, 1895, being £54,860, and £64,512 for the year ending May 31, 1896; whilst the amount required to pay interest on the Debentures is only £21,000, thus leaving a very large margin. With the further development of the Estates, and the additional working capital provided by the present issue, it is anticipated that the annual revenue will be increased to upwards of £100,000. This is not an unreasonable estimate, as Mexico is making marvellous progress. A perusal of a book recently published, under the title of "Mexico, Its Progress and Commercial Possibilities," by E. J. Howell, F.S.S., will strengthen the view which is gradually gaining ground that Mexico is preparing for one of those sudden leaps into prosperity which happen to young nations in the New World at certain periods of their existence. Mr. Howell mentions the important fact that no class of the Mexican population, from the poorest Indian to the most important capitalist, wishes for anything but public order and peaceful business. President Diaz has outlived his most serious opponents, and his firm and equitable rule has created a position of great stability; while public security is assured, not only by the peaceful disposition of the inhabitants, but also by the great efficiency of the "Rurales" (or Country Mounted Police). The country is so fertile that, with an improved system of farming, an almost fabulous amount of produce could be raised. More especially would the further development of the cotton industry, which is aimed at by the Company under review, be fraught with the happiest results. The principal manufacturing industry of the Republic is the making of cotton cloth, mostly "Manta," a coarse, unbleached cotton cloth. Hitherto large imports of raw cotton have taken place, the quantity for 1894-5 having been about 40,000,000 lb. It will be seen, therefore, that there is a very solid basis for such an enterprise as the Mexican Cotton Estates of Tlahualilo. With reference to the Bovril deal, it has since been announced that Mr. Hooley's offer of £2,000,000 for the business and assets of the Company has been accepted by the Board, and that a deposit of £100,000 has been paid. It is understood that Mr. Hooley proposes to make an issue of Debenture, Preference, Ordinary, and Deferred stock, and I have heard the figures given as follows:—Debentures (carrying 4 per cent. interest), £500,000; Preference shares (carrying 5 per cent interest), £500,000; Ordinary shares (carrying 8 per cent. interest), £750,000; and Deferred shares, £750,000; the total capitalisation of the new Company to amount to £2,500,000. The three first-named issues would absorb £105,000 per annum at their fixed rate of interest, and as the Bovril Company is stated to have paid last year a profit of £150,000 net, it will be seen that there would be a considerable surplus for the payment of dividends on the Deferred. The success achieved by the Bovril Company in the past is certainly marvellous, and the formation of this new Company under somewhat sensational circumstances should tend to give Bovril a fresh gratuitous advertisement of no mean value. I also hear it whispered that Mr. Hooley has made a very large contract with one of the most important retailing firms for the disposal of the product of the new Company. With reference to the Minerva Nailless Horseshoe, to which I briefly referred last week, it is stated that it has been tried in the German army for a year with the best results, and that a very favourable report has been presented upon it to our own Army authorities by Lieutenant-Colonel Graham. It is also claimed that the new shoe is being adopted by the Glasgow Corporation and the Great Northern Railway, and that it is to be tried in her Majesty's stud. If the shoe does all that is claimed there should be a great future for it. J. Edwards & Co., stock and share dealers, Talbot House,

CYCLING SUITS are a speciality at Ulster House, Conduit-street, London, W., where Ulsters, Overcoats, and Capes are kept ready for immediate use.

Arundel-street, London, W.C., are again to the front with their invitations to "operations for the rise;" and even in these times of depression on the Stock Exchange they boast of having obtained still further profits for their clients. They claim that they had an operation in Central Argentines, going from March 12 to October 10, and that the net profit was 74¼ per cent. This was evidently a very lengthy "operation," and I should like to meet with some one in the flesh who has received these profits from J. Edwards & Co. The Maypole Soap Syndicate, Limited, is sending out circulars in which it is stated that the Directors propose to sell the business and undertaking to a larger Company to be formed; but as it will be necessary for the Board to spend several thousands of pounds to advertise the new prospectus, they have decided to issue First Mortgage Debentures to the amount of £5,000. I do not know anything about the Maypole Soap Syndicate, Limited, but so far it does not appear to have achieved such a success as to justify a new capitalisation of £100,000. The appeal is hardly one that is likely to be responded to by the public. I hear that the Kidderminster Brewing and Malting Company is about to be offered to the public under the auspices of an influential Board of Directors headed by Sir Frederick Seagar Hunt, Bart., M.P. The acquisition by an English Company of the Dumont Coffee Estates, to which I referred a few weeks ago, seems to have been received with mixed feelings in Brazil. The Journal do Commercio, the principal daily newspaper at Rio, regrets that so fine a national property should go into foreign hands. The Rio News, after stating that "the Fazenda Dumont is one of the most valuable Coffee Estates in Brazil," goes on to point out that the attraction of more foreign capital to the country is just what is wanted.—Your affectionate Uncle, MOSES.

QUEER STORY;

LORD PETERSFIELD'S PUMPS.

YOUNG Viscount Petersfield was remarkable for three things: his intense bashfulness; his indecision of character; and his abnormally small hands and feet. Of the two former qualities he had the grace and the sense to feel ashamed. On the latter he particularly prided himself. And his friends used to remark, with considerable amusement, how he would try to make his hands and feet look even smaller than they were by forcing them into gloves and shoes at least a size too tight. It was obvious that he usually walked in pain, and that his fingers, when gloved, were incapable of any manual exercise. For the rest, he was a quiet, unobtrusive young man, who had the mildest tastes, kept very much to himself, and did not in the least know what to do with his fine income. If he had been born only to a small competency, he would doubtless have been much happier than he was in the possession of £25,000 a year. The cares of his estate and rank merely worried him, and caused him to be run after by Society, of which he would far rather have been quit. He liked nothing better than to be left alone. And the assiduous attentions of the fair sex, to which he was perpetually exposed, kept him in a state of constant discomfort. Not that he was a misogynist, or, indeed, the reverse. On that score he was simply neutral. But his intense bashfulness made it a positive pain for him to associate with any woman. And this it was that led him to avoid the sex as much as possible.

Of course, he was the most eligible of bachelors. Equally of course, he was being everlastingly stalked by husband-hungry mammas and daughters. But they could make nothing of him. Their most sirenic efforts simply frightened him. The abandon with which they threw themselves at him and almost proposed to him confused and distressed his bashful senses beyond expression. Other men would have given their eyes for the tremendous marks of favour which he received from pretty girls. He would have given his eyes—nay, even his hands and feet, which he valued far more—to have been exempt. But exemption was impossible. He was young; single; a viscount. He had £25,000 a year.

One autumn, three or four years ago, Lord Petersfield went down into Sussex to stay with his friends, the Wentwarps, at Wentwarp Hall, a very fine old country seat. Sir John Wentwarp had been a great friend of his father's; and the intimacy between the two elder men, cut short by death, had been partially renewed between the baronet and his deceased friend's only son. This was chiefly why Lord Petersfield went to stay there, to please Sir John, and as an act of duty to his father's memory; for he cordially detested making one in a house party, although, to be sure, he liked all the members of the Wentwarp family well enough; and if he had to visit anywhere, he would have chosen their house in preference to most others. For one thing, they understood his character, and did not worry him with excessive hospitality. And then, for another, the daughters of the house, Mabel and Maud—very pretty girls, too, by the way—did not run after him or make eyes at him. They were simply friendly and cordial towards him, and treated him with just that amount of attention that an amicable politeness required.

But then, of course, there were the other guests, and it was ten to one that he was persecuted by some of these. On the present occasion, when he arrived at Wentwarp, he was greatly dismayed to find that almost his two worst bêtes-noires in Society had been asked there to meet him. These were old Lady Slanderson and her daughter Julia. He detested and feared them both from the bottom of his heart; and had run from their relentless pursuit through a whole season. Nothing could deter the mother. Nothing could put the daughter off. However distant, however unfriendly he showed himself, Lady Slanderson remained cordial and empressée; Julia made eyes at him just the same. The hounds were in full cry, and there was no checking them.

As soon as the Viscount found that these two ladies were staying in the house, he decided to cut his visit short, and to leave as soon as he decently could. But it was, of course, impossible for him to do this just immediately (on account of his worthy host and hostess), and he resigned himself to the prospect of two or three days' stay under the same roof with his obnoxious pursuers. Much, however, can happen in two or three days, and in these two or three days certain things happened which were attended with certain results.

The event round which everything centred—a trifling event, too, in itself—occurred at dinner on the second night of his visit. And it arose out of the poor Viscount's infirmity—his weakness for tight shoes. May it serve as a warning to others who have the same besetting sin!

Now Viscount Petersfield had contracted a deplorable habit of easing his pinched toes by kicking off his pumps, during the progress of dinner, and only resuming them just before he had to jump up in deference to the rising of the ladies. On this particular occasion, he made no exception to his usual habit. He had enjoyed the dinner more than he had expected, because both Lady Slanderson and her daughter were several places removed from him, and also because he sat between two ladies whose company he did not dislike, viz., his hostess, whom he had taken in, and her elder daughter, Mabel. He was even rather sorry when he saw Lady Wentwarp preparing to make the signal, and he had to feel for his vacant pumps. He found them and got them on in time—Phew! Certainly they were abominably tight! When he stood up and moved back the adjacent chairs, they really did hurt him unmercifully. They seemed to throw him forward on his toes, too, in a way to which he was not accustomed. Hilloa! What was this? He looked down at his feet. A throb of deep annoyance, of dismayed embarrassment shook him. Only as the last fair diner swept past him, on her way out, did he realise that his toes were being tortured in a pair of lady's shoes.

They were high-heeled, of black satin, with large rosettes and silver buckles. He had no difficulty in recognising them. They were Mabel Wentwarp's. Then he saw how it was. An embarrassing accident! An unintentional exchange! The young lady must have kicked off her shoes also, and meaning to resume them, have unknowingly resumed his instead. And so she had gone off to the drawing-room in his pumps, and he was left to make what shift he could with the black satins and rosettes. Here was a pretty predicament for a bashful Viscount!

He sat hastily down again, and thrust his feet well under the table, devoutly hoping that none of the other gentlemen had caught sight of the black satin shoes. An ordinary man would, no doubt, have been merely amused at the contretemps and have regarded his position as a very good joke. My lord Viscount, however, saw nothing at all jocular in his accidental annexation of the lady's shoes. The fact was, his sense of humour was almost as conspicuous by its absence as his bashfulness by its perpetual presence. And if he ever did see a joke, it was certainly not on those occasions when he himself happened to be a victim of it. He now began at once to think how he could get rid of the high-heeled satins, before they were "spotted" by any of the other guests.

After carefully considering the matter in his extremely agitated mind, he decided that his best course was to slip away, on some pretext or other, while the gentlemen were still smoking their cigarettes; then to hurry upstairs to his bedroom and exchange the satins for a second pair of pumps, which he remembered that he had, fortunately, brought with him. As his chair happened to be close to one of the exit doors of the dining-room, he believed that he could retire without his feet being noticed. And once out of the dining-room, there was little further danger. Of course—for none of these matters escaped his anxious thoughts—there would still be before him the task of restoring the black satins to Miss Mabel. But that was a less pressing and immediate necessity; for the young lady had doubtless, ere this, discovered her mistake, and changed his shoes for a pair of her own. Having decided on this line of action, he murmured—with a very red face—a few excuses and apologies to his host, and then performed a skilful and speedy exit, with so much rapidity as to make it impossible for the black satins to have been seen. But the shoes hurt him so confoundedly as he began to hurry in them, and altogether rendered walking such an intolerable torture, that no sooner did he find himself safely on the staircase, than he had them off, took them in his hand, and ran quickly upstairs in his stocking-feet.

Now as he passed, with rapid and nervous stealth, along the corridor which led to his room, he happened to notice that one of the bedroom doors on the way stood open. He recognised whose room it was. It was Mabel Wentwarp's. He had often seen her go in and out. And seeing that the chamber was in darkness and evidently empty, it flashed across him that here was a grand opportunity of restoring the young lady's shoes to her, without difficulty or embarrassment. In an instant he had popped them safely inside the door of her room, and was proceeding with a lighter heart towards his own apartment at the end of the passage. He was glad that the open door had made that bright idea occur to him. It relieved him of an embarrassing duty, to which he had looked forward with distressing apprehension.

On reaching his own room, he turned up the gas, and was about to hunt out his second pair of pumps from a cupboard, when his eye fell upon his best pair—the pair which Mabel Wentwarp had appropriated—standing in a conspicuous position by his dressing-table. The discovery caused him a start of surprise; but with the surprise came a definite sense of relief. He saw how it was. Miss Mabel, having discovered her mistake, had had the promptness and delicacy to replace them thus in his room. It was certainly most tactful and considerate of her. No doubt she had done it to spare both him and herself an uncomfortable explanation—an embarrassing re-exchange. The most distressing consequences of the contretemps had thus been obviated. He blessed the young lady's nous and his own discretion, as he hurried down again to the dining-room in his own best pumps.

When they joined the ladies, Lord Petersfield still, however, felt rather nervous, in case any of the fair guests might have shared Miss Mabel's discovery about the exchange of shoes. But he was soon set free from anxiety on this point by Miss Wentwarp herself, who, taking the opportunity to approach him as he stood for a moment alone, murmured, with a blushing, down-cast look:—

"I found out our little mistake, Lord Petersfield, and I at once restored your property to your room. Ssh! No one knows anything about it. Ah!" (turning her eyes down upon his varnished toes). "I see that you have already reclaimed your own!"

"A thousand thanks! I found them in my room. And I have already restored your property," replied his lordship, also blushing.

"That is good of you! And how merciful that our ridiculous mistake was never discovered. We are fellow-sinners, it seems, Lord Petersfield!"

What reply the Viscount would have made, or whether in his confusion he would have found words for any reply at all, cannot be determined. For, at that moment, Julia Slanderson swooped down upon her prey, and to his great annoyance, forcibly annexed him for the rest of the evening.

Next morning after breakfast, the unfortunate Viscount noticed that this persistent young lady was still hovering on the pounce; and not meaning again to be caught by her, he evaded her at the expense of some skill, and slipped off into the dampest and most secluded portion of the garden to enjoy his cigar alone. The morning was chilly, and occasional heavy showers were falling; so that his lordship would much have preferred the cosiness of the smoking-room. But the smoking-room was no safeguard against Miss Julia, who frequently invaded it, and there took a whiff at a cigarette herself. Therefore, our poor hunted Viscount felt that, on this damp morning, the garden and a macintosh were his only resource.

But even so, he was destined to have his solitude invaded. Not, however, by Julia Slanderson. It was Mabel Wentwarp who startled him by suddenly appearing at his side. Her face was white and distressful. Her eyes, he noticed, were bright with unshed tears. As she spoke, it was evident that she could scarcely restrain the sobs which were audibly rising in her pretty throat.

"O, Lord Petersfield!" she exclaimed. "Forgive my intrusion, but I saw you come out and I have followed you, because I—I—have something I—I—must tell you."

"I—I—trust there is nothing the matter!" remarked his lordship, looking embarrassed, and conscious of a vague sense of alarm.

"I—I—cannot deceive you. A great deal is the matter. And—and—it has all arisen out of our—our—foolish mistake last night."

"Eh? What? I—I—thought we—we—had managed that—that—affair all—er—satisfactorily," ejaculated the Viscount, looking very confused and apprehensive.

"So did I. But it appears that we were mistaken. I—I—have just had a dr-dreadful interview with—that—that—odious Lady Slanderson!"

"The dev—oh, I beg your pardon. But—but—do you mean to say that she discovered our—our—mistake?"

"Worse than that," murmured Mabel, in a voice of most pitiable distress.

"How do you mean? What do you mean? I—I—don't understand," queried his lordship, nervously.

"She—she—thinks that she has found out some—something dr-dreadful about us."

And poor Mabel, unable to restrain her feelings any longer, began to sob.

"Oh dear! Pr-pray don't distress yourself, Miss Wentwarp. It—it—whatever it is—can surely be nothing to—to—make you—cr-cry like this?"

"It can: it is!" sobbed poor Mabel. "O, Lord Petersfield, I—I—don't know how I shall tell you the—the shameful things Lady Slanderson said to me. But—but—in justice to you, as well as to myself, I must. . . . . It—it—seems that she was up-upstairs last night, at—at a most unfortunate moment, and that—that—she saw me sl-slip out of your room—without my shoes on!"

THE SANITARY ENGINEERING CO. (Carter Bros.), 65, Victoria-st., Westminster, for making Sanitary Surveys in London or country.

"Good Heavens!" gasped his lordship, in a tone of evident dismay. "What a——"

"And also," Mabel went on, hurriedly, as if anxious to finish her painful disclosure, "She waited up there, spying, in the dark, and saw you slip out of my room—without your shoes on!"

"But, surely," began Lord Petersfield, whose face was now nearly as white as Mabel's, "she——"

"I—I—told her the truth," interposed the girl; "I explained everything. She—she—scoffed at my version. 'She had the sense,' the false, cruel creature told me, 'to put two and two together,' and—and—she said she would—would—'publish the scandal to the four winds of heaven.' O, Lord Petersfield! What is to be done?"

"I will tell her. I will corroborate your statement," exclaimed the Viscount in an agitated voice.

"I said that you would," sobbed poor Mabel, hopelessly, "and she said that you were—an—an—interested party, and that she should not think of believing you."

"But, surely," stammered Lord Petersfield, who was naturally in a great state of mind, "people will accept our version rather than that of this vile old scandal-monger!"

"Alas!" sobbed Mabel, "I wish I thought so. You see, Lord Petersfield, I cannot help recognising the very unfortunate state of appearances. This is what Lady Slanderson will say—and it sounds unhappily plausible. She will say that if—if—we had—any—anything to conceal, we should, of course, be ready with an explanation, and that even at that, our explanation is lame and improbable. Besides, I know that dreadful woman too well to suppose that she will only confine herself to what she actually saw; she will enlarge, and exaggerate, and—and tell l— falsehoods, until —— Oh, I had rather have died than have had this happen! I—I—shall be r-ruined and disgraced for ever. I—I—shall never be able to hold up my head in Society again!"

"Oh, come, my dear Miss Wentwarp! It cannot surely be so bad as that," expostulated his lordship, with a confused, distracted air. "We must find some way to stop that—that—lying woman's mouth. To——"

"There is no way to shut it," groaned the unhappy young lady, despairingly. "I am a girl, Lord Petersfield, and my character is hopelessly compromised. If I had been a man, now——"

"What is to be done? How can I save you?" broke in the Viscount, wringing his hands, and evidently at his wits' end with dismay. "How—how—foolish I was to—to—enter your room—to——"

"And I to enter yours. But what is done is done!" said Mabel, checking her sobs, and speaking with solemn desperation. "I am prepared to face the worst!"

The Viscount was silent for a minute. A sudden idea, borne of the circumstances, had flashed across his mind. He had never thought of Mabel in this light before. He would not have done so now, unless the situation had forced it on him; but as he looked at her pretty, woeful face, he realised that it was not such an unwelcome light in which to think of her after all. In an instant (as shy men will) he had blurted out his mind, though rather enigmatically.

"My—my—dear Miss Mabel. I—I—might, for all that Lady Slanderson knows to the contrary, have—have—acquired the right to—to—take your—your—slippers to your room."

"I—I——What do you mean, Lord Petersfield?"

"Why," replied his lordship, blushing and stammering, "if I were—were—engaged to be married to you, Miss Mabel, it w-would make a—a—difference—wouldn't it?"

"Oh no, Lord Petersfield! Not that! Not that!" she cried, starting away.

"Couldn't you s-stand me at—at—any price, then?" gasped the Viscount, painfully mortified.

"Oh, yes. I—it was not that. I should—I mean I could not let you s-sacrifice yourself to—to—save my reputation."

"It wouldn't be much of a sacrifice," said his lordship, with an admiring glance at her fresh young face. "Do you know, I am rather glad now that this—this—unfortunate situation has opened my eyes? It—it—shows me something I didn't realise before. I—I—— Oh, Mabel, will you?"

These things have a way of happening suddenly. And it now happened suddenly that Mabel Wentwarp found herself enfolded in Lord Petersfield's mackintosh cape.

* * * * *

"He is a noble man, mamma," said the newly-engaged girl to her mother a few hours later. "He—he—says he didn't realise that he loved me till this morning. And I did not realise that—that—I loved him. If I had, I would n-never have played that horrid practical joke upon him about his—his pumps. But when he—he—sp-spoke to me, I knew in a moment that—that—I did love him; and that it had been cruel—shameful of me to carry on the j-joke this morning, simply to embarrass him. You will—will—never tell him that I meant it, originally, for a stupid hoax, will you, mamma dear?"

Lady Wentwarp smiled and kissed her.

"Don't be afraid of that, Mab. Your old mother will not give you away. It was a risky sort of joke, wasn't it? Though it has had the happiest results, as it seems to have opened both your eyes."

"An interchange of shoes resulted in an interchange of hearts," murmured Mabel, smiling with roguish happiness.

"Yes, Mab. But be careful, in this instance, not to hazard a re-exchange. Lord Petersfield's heart is worth a good deal more than his pumps."

MUSIC.

MORE ABOUT LANSDOWNE COTTELL.

I AM still in receipt of plenty of correspondence concerning Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, his London Conservatoire of Music in Porchester-road, his "free" scholarships, and his "salaried" secretaries. Some of these letters I cannot notice, and I must beg my correspondents to stick to facts, if possible supported by documents (of which there seem to be plenty), and to be as brief as practicable. Firstly, however, let me deal with a communication which I have received from Mr. Percy Harrison, of Birmingham. Mr. Harrison, in reply to my suggestion for an explanation why "Messrs. Harrison's Music Warehouse" was given as the address of the "Birmingham and Midlands District branch" of this precious "Conservatoire," writes:—

> I do not quite understand why any explanation at all is needed, either from my firm or myself, nor do I concede the right of any one to ask for it, as regards our having let to a professor of music for teaching purposes a room which some time ago we built specially for that purpose. Except from an article I happened to see in TRUTH a week or two ago (I do not remember the exact date), I know of nothing to the discredit of Mr. Cottell, who has always fulfilled his business obligations to ourselves faithfully and promptly. As a matter of fact, however, we have from the commencement of his tenancy objected to the mention of our name upon Mr. Cottell's prospectuses in such a manner as might possibly give the impression that we were in any way connected with the Conservatoire ourselves; not that I know of anything to the discredit of the Conservatoire, but simply that we did not think it was fair to other professors of music also using our teaching rooms, and some few months ago we asked Mr. Cottell to terminate his tenancy for the reason that we found that, notwithstanding an alteration in the address of the Birmingham branch upon a new issue of prospectuses (made at our request), the old prospectus was still somehow or other in circulation. Mr. Cottell does not now, therefore, give lessons at our warehouse.

Such pastoral simplicity from the Midlands will surely elicit admiration. Mr. Cottell's methods of doing business are perfectly obvious, and whether or not Mr. Harrison "concedes the right" of any one to ask for explanations, he has only himself to thank if the honoured name of himself or his firm is mixed up with these shady transactions. What on earth the punctual fulfilment of "business obligations to ourselves," or, in other words, the payment to Messrs. Harrison of some sort of rent, has to do with the matter I cannot in this case understand. Rent would, I am sure, have no weight whatever with a house of so high a character, so high, indeed, that before the name of his firm was mentioned in connection with an enterprise such as that of Mr. Cottell, Mr. Harrison would have been wise to have made some inquiries. Mr. Cottell's newest circular, which has been sent to me, contains among the "branches" the announcement, "Birmingham, Messrs. W. S. Riley & Sons, Corporations-treet," the circular adding, "The director attends the branches for the examination of candidates for resident and other scholarships." What say Messrs. Riley & Sons? Another correspondent writes:—

Your correspondent Mr. F. was quite correct in his explanation of the "free" scholarships of the London Conservatoire of Music, though the modus operandi varies in accordance with the musical knowledge of the applicant. In my case introduction was made through an advertisement in the Daily Telegraph in which "Vocalists with experience were required for chorus in an opera which has been successfully run for some time," &c., &c., and my "free" education was to be given owing to my voice not being set, my age being but seventeen. Needless to say, after I had paid 31s. 6d. for the quarter's tuition, my indignation was very great when I found I was to pay another guinea for the music library, although I had had only three pieces of music while I had this "free" tuition. Two out of the three pieces paid for out of the library fund can be bought from any music dealer for a penny. With reference to Mr. Wood's application for secretaryship, the only secretary I knew was Mrs. Lansdowne Cottell.

Another gentleman writes at considerable length that he also answered these advertisements twelve or fourteen years ago:—

Mr. Cottell then advertised, as he has done recently, that free tuition would be granted for talent, &c. I stated I played the flute, and was granted an interview. This partook somewhat of the nature of an examination, which apparently was satisfactory. I was then asked for a guinea, which was called the library fee. I paid it, but all the tuition I received was this. An aged professor was engaged, who taught nearly every instrument under the sun, and we—that is to say, those who had entered under similar conditions to myself—were given about ten minutes once a week. The only music I received was one exercise. I was asked if I would join the orchestra at another guinea. I demurred, and said I would like to hear the orchestra first, but Mrs. Cottell informed me that this was quite against the rules. . . . I saw Mrs. Cottell one evening, and asked to see Mr. Cottell, as I was not satisfied with the tuition I had received. She tried to put me down in a very high-handed manner, but I persisted, and when I eventually did see Mr. Cottell he accused me of being insulting to his wife, and tried to wave me out of the room. I, feeling very much annoyed, gave him a piece of my mind, and threatened to write to the Press, when his manner entirely changed.

Another correspondent writes apropos to the advertisements for secretary, and upon which question I may have something more to say shortly:—

I can quite confirm what your correspondents tell you about the above benefactor. The first time I saw his advertisement three years ago I jumped at it, with the usual result, that the salary disappeared and the qualifying period became an urgent necessity, with a premium. Of course, I backed out, but I received numerous packets and advertisements from him after my application. Since then I have noticed his advertisements in the Times and other papers. About a year after my application I answered him again to see how the game was. He was evidently on the same tack, and still very deficient in note-paper, his correspondence being limited to odds and ends.

These examples of my correspondence will doubtless be instructive to the public and, possibly, also to that unsuspicious gentleman, Mr. Percy Harrison.

Two more Festivals took place last week, and both might have been more successful had they been held in September instead of October. The September Festivals are usually profitable; but to clash in October with the London concert season and with numerous performances given in the country is surely foolish on the part of Festival committees. The Sheffield Festival was, however, a new affair, and was limited to a couple of days without novelties. A choir of about 300 voices, picked from four times that number of Yorkshire singers, was the chief item of interest; and it was, indeed, quite the best chorus of the present year's festivals.

At Bristol they are congratulating themselves that there will be little or no call on the guarantors—a fact which will interest those luckless individuals far more than the general public. Bristol is not likely to do much better while it confers the pride of place upon German vocalists who know little of English oratorio, and while it cannot more judiciously choose its novelties. The Festival was held too late in October, and the programmes were of preposterous proportions. Evening concerts nearly four hours long are a gross absurdity either at festivals or anywhere else, and, indeed, as a matter of fact, not a single night's programme at Bristol last week was finished, it in every case being necessary to strike out two or three items in order to get the affair over before the last train started for the outskirts. The choir singing here, indeed, was the biggest attraction, particularly in Brahms' noble "German Requiem" and Parry's "Job." Of the novelties Gounod's "Requiem" was the feeblest. It is quite "old man's" music, and, although very simple and melodious, it would have been better for the composer's memory if a festival production had been avoided. It is essentially a work for the Church The curious mistake was made by nearly all the London "specials" who went down to Bristol to do this work (although it is only fair to say that the "specials" were chiefly deputies, most of the critics remaining in London for the Colonne concerts) that while Gounod was playing the Requiem over at the piano on October 15, 1893, he suddenly died; the date, it was expressly pointed out, being exactly three years to the day before the production of the "Requiem" at Bristol. As a matter of fact, Gounod died on October 18. Three days before, it is true, he was seized with one of his numerous fainting fits, although I do not suppose that the "Requiem" had anything particularly to do with it. Professor Prout's organ concerto, produced, it seems, in Bristol twelve years since, was played by Mr. Riseley. Those who think Professor Prout a rampant Wagnerite, which he is not, may be interested to learn that the concerto in question is more or less Mozartian. A clever setting was introduced by Mr. Miles, a local musician, of Coleridge's "Hymn to Sunrise," about as unfit for musical treatment as any poem I know. Mr. Miles is a pupil of Dr. Hubert Parry—a fact which his music sufficiently indicates. A short scena, entitled "Siddartha," by Mr. Roeckel, was well sung by Mr. Andrew Black, although otherwise it did not make any particular impression. It rained pretty persistently through the week—a fact upon which one of the "specials" seems greatly inclined to impute blame to the Festival Committee.

An enthusiastic amateur, Mr. A. Morten, writes me in laudatory terms, which I am sure are well deserved, of the performance recently at the Crystal Palace by Mr. Manns' permanent orchestra of six of Beethoven's symphonies; in the "Eroica," he adds, "the wondrous Marche Funèbre literally wringing drops of blood from the hearts of the sensitive." If Mr. Morten is right in his use of the word "literally," the case, I fear, is one for the coroner.

The Colonne season ended on Saturday afternoon, and the band three hours later left for Brussels, where I hope they will have better programmes, and, consequently, better luck. The British public nowadays demand a specialty. Wagner and Beethoven are the specialty of Richter, Wagner of Mottl, and so forth. M. Colonne's specialty is Berlioz, for the only two works which he gave by Wagner showed that he is by no means in sympathy with the Bayreuth master, while his rendering of Beethoven's C minor symphony could have been bettered at many a London concert. But in Berlioz M. Colonne is a truly great conductor, and we shall all hope to hear the more neglected works of this much-neglected French master when the Châtelet Band next returns to us.

Just as the Colonne Orchestra started for Brussels on Saturday night one of the players discovered that he had left his viola in a cab. His grief was very touching, and mingled with it was a sort of half-suspicion that his carelessness was mainly due to the traditional perfidiousness of Albion. The instrument in its case was, however, at once taken to the station by a scared cabman, who declared that it looked like a baby's coffin, and might frighten his missus. The sovereign reward which the cabman received will, when put into the bulkier form of francs, doubtless still more frighten the French viola player, and when he is invited to pay the amount, will convince him that there is something else to be avenged than Waterloo.

Although I was not astonished to read in a halfpenny paper on Saturday that M. Colonne was "the founder of the famous Berlioz cycle"—the writer apparently labouring under the impression that this is a new grade of wheel—I confess it rather startled me when I read in my Pall Mall Gazette, apropos of the Archbishop's memorial service at Westminster Abbey, that "Dr. Purcell was at the organ." We have only recently celebrated the bi-centenary of Purcell's birth, and if we could only catch the veteran in his old place in the Abbey, an interview would settle the question which has so long estranged Professor Bridge and Mr. W. H. Cummings, out of which particular window Purcell was looking when he died. Then the Pall Mall gentleman—an able writer, who forgot how dangerous it is for a layman to meddle with musical criticism—went on to say:—"The beautiful hymn by Dean Milman, 'Brother, thou art gone before us,' was sung to Bridge's version, which is shorter, and in many respects more beautiful than the setting by Croft." Poor old Croft lies buried in the Abbey since 1727, of a chill contracted at the coronation of George II. The anachronism is almost as funny as the hopeless blundering of the Festival preacher, who eloquently descanted upon the feelings of Handel when he first heard the Baal choruses in "Elijah."

Senor Sarasate drew an enormous audience to the Crystal Palace on Saturday, his only appearance with an orchestra this season. He played Mendelssohn's concerto in his old and almost perfect style, taking the final movement, indeed, about as rapidly as it could be taken. Dr. Richter has returned, and on Monday gave his first concert at Queen's Hall. Unfortunately the three Dvorak novelties could not be heard this autumn, as the Bohemian composer is making some slight alterations in the music. Beethoven and Wagner are, however, the best draws for Richter, and the present series promises to be worth a pile of money. The performance on Monday of the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" was one of the finest amateurs have heard for many years.

The Sunday concerts began for the winter last Sunday, and the Lord's Day Observance Society will doubtless be interested to learn that in about a dozen concert halls and Town Halls in various parts of London the audiences aggregated some fifteen thousand people. A new Festal March for organ, entitled "Illogan," by Mr. H. C. Tonking, had a capital reception at the Albert Hall; while for "The Golden Legend," at Queen's Hall, more than five hundred people failed to gain admission to this crowded building. I marvel how much longer the absurd fiction will be continued of considering these popular Sunday concerts illegal.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—Most of the new hats are worn over one eye, and they are most becoming. A black felt that we saw at Clematis's, in Maddox-street, was trimmed with pale blue velvet in tall loops and bows, and a miniature hedge of feathers, green and white. Another, with the brim in black velvet, had a high crown of white satin, veiled with a transparent embroidery in pink and green chenille and sequins. A plume of cocks' feathers gave the necessary touch of height, and there was also a black gauze ruche. Very picturesque was a green beaver hat in the Marie Antoinette shape, the high crown being embroidered with "pines" in cashmere tints and gold, and the whole trimmed with sky-blue velvet and a flat bow of chinchilla. A rose pink felt hat was trimmed with black velvet lace and three or four plumes of the bird of Paradise, with their lovely curves dyed black. Capes and boas to suit the headgear were strewed about, and Lilla, who was with us, tried almost every one of them on. She bought a delicious toque for wearing at Niagara. The crown is white satin, studded with emeralds and diamonds, the trimming consisting of green velvet, sable, clusters of violets, and black feathers. For church wear she also purchased a bonnet, with the quaintest little upright "curtain" at the back in dark green velvet. The bonnet itself is in wavy lines of green and gold embroidery, with bows of emerald green velvet, and a little sable introduced.

Evening dress is to be beautiful this season. You would agree with me if you could see some of the lovely dresses that Russell & Allen have prepared for dinner, ball, play, and reception. Mr. Augustine Joyce is a colourist, both born and made, and his effects are always excellent, and, at the same time, subordinated to the becoming, this, after all, being the great thing. Fancy a brocade with ground in a tone of delicate ivory, the skirt arranged in a very deep flounce, in itself making quite two-thirds of the length, and put on straight round with a thick cord. The design of the brocade consists of clusters of golden wheat ears glittering with a satin sheen. The flounce is cut out in curves all the way round, and edged with small ruches of yellow chiffon. Under the flounce are glimpses to be seen of a yellow chiffon petticoat, with rows of ruching to match. The bodice is turned back from the front in small rolled revers, edged with more narrow yellow ruching. Between them falls a plastron of bright turquoise velvet, wide at the top and falling loosely in a point at the waist. This is embroidered with silver, diamonds, and turquoise exactly matched to the tint of the velvet. You can imagine the effect of this bit of brilliant blue with the yellow and ivory of the brocade. The sleeves are made of folds upon folds of soft yellow chiffon with the arm showing just a little bit between them.

And here is another delicious evening gown. The skirt is pink satin, with soft pink roses outlining an imaginary tablier in front and forming drooping curves all round. From the highest point where the vandykes meet there is a little falling drapery of pink chiffon, tassel-shaped, and caught near the top with a diamond buckle. The front of the bodice is all soft chiffon barred across with narrow bands of pink satin embroidered with silver and finished with bows of pink and silver. Round the shoulders are more pink roses, the petals soft and loose, and guiltless of green, like those on the skirt. There is, however, a wide green sash floating out over the skirt at the back and edged all round with pink chiffon. This sash begins in folded flatness at the back of the arms and meeting at the waist under three or four loops, some pointing upwards, some downwards, but all held in place by a sweet little waistband of pink satin and silver. The sleeves are satin puffs veiled by a double frill of pink chiffon, edged with narrow, but very full, pink ruches.

Have I mentioned epaulettes of roses and a spray of silver dog roses in front? Don't you admire that gown?

And here is a black satin, skirt plain, and bodice with a vest of creamy embroidered net, drawn down to a point in front, and given a pinky warmth by the introduction of a little pink chiffon behind it. The epaulettes are a considerable feature, being made in the shape of revers in gold lace embroidered with turquoises and black velvet. A narrow black velvet ruche makes a softening line round the shoulders, and the bodice is finished with black satin at the waist.

Both smart and chic is a white satin, with a high bodice of cream-tinted lace made full in front under a bow of narrow turquoise velvet caught with a large steel buckle.

"The Riding Habit has a perfectly shaped skirt and a beautifully moulded bodice, cut as only Busvine of Brook-street can cut."—The World, July 22nd, 1896.

HUNTING.—An elegant and graceful up-to-date figure is produced by the easy and perfect fit of the ingenious and appropriate Corsets built by Mesdames SYKES, JOSEPHINE, & Co., Anatomical Corsetières, 280, Regent-street, Oxford-circus, London, W.

A similar buckle fastened the wide, folded band of blue velvet at the waist. But the sweetest touch was a dainty little zouave of the turquoise velvet, edged with silver, and sewn with turquoises, and made quite short. In front it curved round and away again, leaving the full lace front uncovered, with its runnings of white satin baby ribbon. The long, tight sleeves were covered with lace under lace epaulettes, with narrow satin ribbon run through.

I am afraid my description has scarcely conveyed the subtle charm of this quiet but most effective bodice.

For a girl, what could be prettier than a white satin, the bodice trimmed with fine lace laid over pink chiffon, and embroidered in silver and brilliants? The sleeves are soft billows of pink chiffon, and the front of the bodice is all pink softness veiled with the jewelled lace. The bodice is cut out in heart-shape in front, and a design of lily of the valley embroidered in silver and tied with a diamond bow follows the curved outline.

A high dinner bodice was in bright pink silk with black chiffon lightly frilled over it, very narrow, hemmed frills crossing it, each headed with jet sequins. The sleeves were veiled with black net appliqué with white lace and brightened with jet.

A smart bodice of this kind could be worn with a black skirt or a pink, according to occasion, and would therefore prove extremely useful. A band of pink and one of white satin were folded round the waist as a finish, and the lace on the chest and shoulders was transparent. The skirt was in pink veiled with black chiffon and trimmed with a full flounce of the same headed with jet sequins. Another love of a bodice was in black satin and bright apple-green. It was made with a zouave and had little bands held with rows of small diamond clasps. And a third was made of white embroidered lisse kilted and finished with a group of yellow satin bows on either side of the front, also a belt of the satin.

Some lovely embroideries were among the sights we saw in that happy half-hour. One was in palest green satin with butterflies in their natural colours wrought in beads, the satin between them being studded with diamonds and silver sequins. Another was in white satin with a design of narrow black lace appliqué upon it in the shape of immense bows, the curves of which went rippling round the skirt. A huge turquoise clasp held the centre of each bow, and the lace was everywhere outlined with jet and steel sequins.

And with a last bit of embroidery, intended for the skirt and bodice of a dress, my list closes. On white satin, it consisted of pink coral, pearls, and diamonds, worked together in a design so light and graceful that the very architecture of it was a pleasure to the eye. Rising in tiers of perpendicular lines, wide at the base and becoming more and more slender as they became higher, their airy lightness of effect was conspicuous.

Do not you always find the selection of a dress for a fancy ball a brain-racking problem? I do; there are so many characters one thinks about, and it is so difficult to make up one's mind which will suit one best. I am, therefore, thankful to Messrs. Debenham & Freebody for bringing out a new and improved edition of "Fancy Dresses Described." The volume gives you a vast array of costumes to choose from, but the lucid description of them by "Ardern Holt" (Mrs. Carson), together with the advice she gives and the numerous illustrations in colours and black and white by Miss Lilian Young, greatly simplify your task. The edition just published has been brought up to date, and is practically a new book.

Do you wear fringe nets? We find them a grand institution in this damp weather It is pleasant to be able to go out without a veil, and one cannot well do this unless one wears a net, for it is extremely disagreeable to feel the fringe growing gradually more and more beyond control. The nets are made of human hair. I cannot imagine how the peasant women of France can manage to net them without breaking the delicate material.

Some girls pin them on too tightly and give a precise and formal look of stiffness to the top of the head, instead of the light softness that should be the ideal. We often wonder what we should do without them.

Maud's baby is such a darling! She is immensely delighted with it, and her dear little face wears a chronic smile of joy and happiness. Motherhood has deepened the expression of her eyes. As to Charlie, it is funny to see him trying not to look pleased when we are all worshipping the baby. He is five months old now, and has just had a new winter pelisse, a sweet thing in cream-coloured plush, with a collar of white Thibet goat. In his white felt hat, with its ostrich plumes and silk pompons, he is a delicious little scrap. Clare and Bee pay him daily visits, and are intensely gratified when they manage to evoke a toothless smile from him. The deep solemnity that invariably follows this relaxation amuses me immensely. Surely that tiny morsel can scarcely realise already the impending woes of human existence?

Are you going to learn to play the bagpipes? It seems it is the fashionable thing to do. After the tum-tum of the banjo comes the skirling of the Celt. By the way, I wonder if there is any philological connection between the word Celt and "kilt"?

Though I have Scotch blood in my veins, I must admit that there are times when I do not love the bagpipes. Out of doors and a long way off there is something pleasing about their barbaric music, and no one who has not heard pipers play "Lochaber no More" and "The Flowers of the Forest" could imagine what depths of pathos they can express. But in a room, however large, the bagpipes are enough to drive anybody mad.

I don't think I shall learn to play them!

Just fancy how one would have to blow out one's cheeks in order to elicit the due amount of skirling; and then it would be quite unorthodox to make the music without doing a sentry-go up and down the room. What a ridiculous figure one would cut! But if it is to be the fashion, little will people reck of that!

Niagara reopened on Monday afternoon. We went, and found a full attendance, in spite of the weather, which was dismal, dark, and dreary in the extreme. It was a delicious contrast to come in from the murky greyness outside to the warmth and brightness of the corridors, with their thick, soft carpets, and coloured lights. There was, as usual, some excellent skating, and we noticed some very sweet frocks. One was brown, with a wide, folded belt of green velvet. A too delicious cape was in black velvet, with a deep flounce of chinchilla over wide embroidered lace. We saw also a chinchilla coat with black velvet sleeves which pleased us mightily. The prices of admission are unaltered, but non-skaters are admitted in the afternoon on payment of half-a-crown apiece. Books of tickets are to be had at reduced rates. We intend to go very often, as it is all so bright and festive. There are to be four fancy balls, the dates of which are not yet fixed.

Clare sends me the following:—

Dearest Madge,—At this season, when life is not being "rushed," but rather, as some think, allowed to stagnate, there is time to practise the almost lost art of thinking. Especially if one be in a quiet country house where the older fashion prevails of leaving the men in undisturbed possession of the right to slaughter, and the women to their own devices. One cannot talk all day; less now than at any other time of the year, for, by the usual irony of fate, the dearth of materials to make conversation is greatest when the need for them is most. A kind of lethargy seems to fall on society with the fall of the leaf, gossip grows fitful and thin, even scandal languishes. One topic of conversation alone does not fall away, but quite the contrary; the weather nobly does its best to make up for all other deficiencies. It comes amongst us in every variety of rampant mood, forcing our attention by its destructive vagaries; blowing down trees, destroying gardens, and hurling winter into our midst, whilst we are still fondly nursing hopes of a possible St. Martin's summer.

Perhaps the sea, which we are in sound of here, made us pensive, or the roar of the wind in the trees, and the swish of the rain through the air. We all began to think, more or less, but decidedly more than at any time before during the year. Some were only thinking out their coming toilets, and some their winter plans, but others, taking a wider range, applied themselves to thinking out life in general. As the result of our reflections, we were all agreed that if we only did think occasionally we should not take life so "rushingly," nor swallow our enjoyments so quickly one after another, that we cannot really taste any one of them. Somehow or other, every one who is any one now, is called on to do a great deal more than a man's or woman's work in the day, and, of course, we all follow suit. In fact, only the working man, with his limit of hours, has leisure.

What a record the visit of the Emperor and Empress of Russia to France supplied! On reading all that they did in a few days, with no more than the usual amount of hours, one was almost obliged to think that Royal nature must be superior to mere human nature. One is glad for the sake of the Royal pair—not to forget the baby too—and somewhat for our own sakes also, that they have disappeared into private life out of the columns of the daily papers. Poor Dr. Benson! He wanted a greater holiday than his visit to Ireland gave him. He had had too busy a time here between business, social engagements, and sight-seeing.

Dublin is now beginning to fill again, but it is not announced when the Lord Lieutenant will return to the Viceregal Lodge. It is usual for the Chief Secretary to occupy his residence in the Phœnix Park from November till the meeting of Parliament calls him to London. Probably Mr. Gerald and Lady Betty Balfour will soon arrive there. Lady Betty was an ardent cyclist last year; the roads in the Phœnix are very good and very extensive, and much patronised by cyclists in general. The "bike" has conquered the world, but there remains yet the weather and the mud for it to conquer. The cyclist is just as sensitive to wind, in his own way, as the seaman in his. Breezes find him out, of which the pedestrian is happily unconscious—adverse winds in especial. Is it not the curious case with every cyclist that no matter what point of the compass he may be turned to, the wind has a knack of being in his face? In its future developments one wonders if the bicycle will be able to get across country. Then, indeed, the horse would be in a parlous way. Meanwhile, the hunter maintains his position unshaken. The gathering together of mighty hunters is already beginning in Meath. Amongst the new arrivals in the county this season are Lord and Lady Downshire. Lord Downshire does not live much at his family place in the County of Down, but he has the taste for the horse of most of his countrymen, and appears in Ireland usually for the Horse Show week, and such-like high festivals of the animal. The races at Tullow, County Carlow, were very successful last week and were patronised by the elect of the county, Mr. J. Doyne dispensing hospitality after a most generous fashion. The weather, though cold, had calmed down from the boisterous mood, so disturbing for out-of-door pastimes.—Yours ever, CLARE.

I am compelled, dear, to hold my recipes over until next week.—Your loving cousin, MADGE.

At all Booksellers' and Newsagents, crown 8vo, 6s.

SIR GEORGE TRESSADY

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

Author of "Robert Elsmere," "The History of David Grieve," "Marcella," &c.

From the Westminster Gazette:—"Mrs. Humphry Ward's latest novel is in many respects the best book that she has written. From first to last it is a novel of striking power, written with remarkable insight, delicacy, and restraint, and handled, especially in the opening and closing chapters, with a touch that only great artists of literature possess."

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

HOW TO MAKE AN INCOME-PAYING HOME.

The object of the above Company is to develop the resources of their estate, consisting of about 12,000 acres, situated iu the far-famed Tulbagh district in the Western Province of Cape Colony, about 75 miles distaut by rail from Cape Town. They are promoting the establishment of a successful colony. The estate has been surveyed and laid out in blocks of about 40 acres each, a number of which have already been sold. The purchase price of this land this year (with all water facilities) is £12 per acre, threequarters of which cau remain bearing interest at six per cent. per annum.

In order to provide for the success of every colonist who has sufficieut capital at command to be able to enter into this business, but has no practical knowledge of the work, the company have engaged the services of an efficient manager and a skilled horticulturist; and who will, if desired, plant, cultivate, and attend to the development of each client's farm for one year or more.

Thus any settler, provided he gives ordinary attention to the details of the work this company have undertaken for him, cau obtain, under the guidance of a skilled specialist, that practical knowledge which is essential in the working to the best advantage of dairy and fruit farms.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

The Company undertake, if desired, to clear, plant, feuce, supervise, and generally manage any holding. They guarantee that 90 per cent. of the trees aud vines planted under the supervision of their staff grow to maturity, as specified in the agreement, a copy of which can be obtained on application The company will manage the estate of any absentee at a charge of £1 a year per acre, and will also undertake to erect on the estate any houses for the residence of a settler, which can be chosen in London before sailing, with estimates given. They further undertake to purchase from a settler, at marketable prices, any approved dairy, farm, and orchard produce.

At the company's headquarters, at Seven Fountains, are the orchard and vineyard belonging to the company, and extensive creameries, packing houses, &c., will be erected as soon as necessary.

Steps are already being taken for the erection of a sugar beet factory, &c., and it is the intentiou of the company to promote milling and other industries.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

The Company solicit enquiries from families who are seeking a fresh start in life.

Young gentlemen who are looking for an opening in which to make their way.

Farmers who for years have been losing money in this country and would like to start afresh.

Retired members of the Military, Naval, and Civil Services, desiring to iucrease their incomes.

The delicate (those inclined to bronchial and pulmonary troubles) who need an avenue for making an income in a congenial climate.

The General Manager of the Company is going out at the beginning of October, and will be pleased to have the Company of any one who desires to avail himself of this opportunity of a fresh start in life in a new field.

All are requested to be good enough to place themselves in communication with the Secretary of the Company—
3, PANCRAS LANE, QUEEN STREET, LONDON, E.C.,
from whom full particulars and papers on all points can be obtained. Also the illustrated book on the subject, price 2s., together with a Manual of Practical Orchard Work at the Cape. Published by the Department of Agriculture of the Cape of Good Hope.

EPPS'S COCOAINE.

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.

(TEA-LIKE.)

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely-flavoured powder—"Cocoaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system.

VAN STEEN'S PEPTONISED ABSOLUTE

Delicious and Nutritive . . . SOLUBLE COCOA.

(Patent No. 23,503.)

The ingredients added to this "Pure Cocoa" are harmless, and so small in quantity that the taste is quite disguised, at the same time the process of peptonising is perfect.

The nutritive value of this Cocoa in conjunction with the quickness with which it is assimilated renders it of the greatest value to the chronic dyspeptic and the sufferer from the excess of uric acid, thus placing it in the highest rank of foods suited to those with enfeebled digestive organs and kindred ailments.

This Peptonised Cocoa agrees with everybody even when ordinary cocoa disagrees.

Wholesale of Messrs. SANGER & CO., London; Messrs. EDWARDS & SON, London; Messrs. W. SUTTON & CO., London; Messrs. GOODALL, BACKHOUSE, & CO., Leeds; Messrs. EVANS GADD & CO., Exeter.

The debentures with coupons attached, payable in London in sterling on 1st April and 1st October in each year, will be delivered in exchange for the fully-paid scrip on the 1st April, 1897.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company was formed in 1890 to acquire and develop the Tlahualilo Cotton Estate, situated in the Laguna District, in the State of Durango, Northern Mexico, together with the franchises, concessions, water rights, &c., thereto pertaining.

The total area of its properties (which are held in fee-simple, under registered titles), according to the Engineer's report, is about 135,000 acres, of which approximately 122,000 are alluvial lands.

About 66,000 acres are now developed and producing net profits as shown below. The principal object of the present issue of Mortgage Debentures is to enable the Company to complete, without further delay, the development and equipment of the remaining 69,000 acres.

The condition of Mexico itself, as to its finances, internal development, and security, is one of increasing prosperity, and its promise for the future is bright and encouraging.

Fuller particulars of the properties will be found in the statement of Mr. James Brown Potter, enclosed with the full Prospectus.

Copies of the Engineering and other Expert Reports can be obtained on application at the Bankers, Solicitors, and Stockbrokers, below mentioned.

The accounts of the Company, since its incorporation, have been submitted to Messrs. Herman Lescher & Co., Chartered Accountants, of 6, Clement's-lane, E.C., whose certificate appears in the full Prospectus.

The net profits for the year 1894-5 amounted to £54,860 3s. 6d., or considerably more than twice, and those for the year 1895-6 to £64,512 3s. 3d., or more than three times the amount required to pay the interest—£21,000—on this issue of debentures, and it is anticipated that with the further development of the estates and the additional working capital provided for by the present issue the net annual revenue will be largely increased.

As additional security for the Debenture Holders the Company will covenant with the trustees to apply its net revenue in each year, after payment of interest on the Debentures and before payment of any dividend on its share capital, to the following purposes.

1. To providing a Sinking Fund, in accordance with the Trust Deed, for the redemption of the Debentures by drawings at £105 per cent., commencing 1st October, 1901, or by purchase in the market under that price as set out in the draft Trust Deed.
2. To setting aside Five per Cent. of the net profits as a reserve fund.

Applications for Debentures should be made on the form accompanying prospectus, and forwarded to The London Bank of Mexico and South America, Limited, No. 144, Leadenhall-street, E.C., with a remittance for the amount of the deposit.

Full prospectuses and forms of application may be obtained from The London Bank of Mexico and South America, Limited, 144, Leadenhall-street, E.C.; from W. H. Morrison, Esq., Founders'-court, E.C.; and from Messrs. Laurence, Sons, & Gardner, 13, Copthall-court, E.C.

London, 15th October, 1896.

TO INVESTORS.

STOCK CONVERSION AND INVESTMENT TRUST, LIMITED (LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN DEFERRED CHARGE STOCK).—Attention is drawn to the above Stock, which is quoted on the London and leading provincial Stock Exchanges. It receives for each year ending June 30th all dividends paid in excess of 5% on an equal amount of London and North-Western Railway Ordinary Stock. Its last dividend was at the rate of One Pound Five Shillings Per Cent., which at the present price of the Stock—viz., 29 per cent.—YIELDS A RETURN OF FOUR POUNDS SIX SHILLINGS PER CENT., and EACH ADDITIONAL FIVE SHILLINGS PER CENT. PAID ON LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN ORDINARY STOCK WILL INCREASE THIS RETURN BY SEVENTEEN SHILLINGS PER CENT.

The London and North-Western Railway traffic has increased by over £100,000 during the past 12 weeks, and there is thus every reason to anticipate an increasing dividend. No Home Railway Security yields so good an income return. The register of this Stock is kept by the National Provincial Bank of England, Limited.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Corporation has been formed for the purpose of acquiring the practical monopoly of land in the rapidly rising district of Gladstone, Port Curtis (Central Queensland). The present extension of the great Railway System of Australia (now in course of completion) should speedily convert this natural Port into the leading commercial City of Queensland—a Colony which bids fair to take a premier position amongst British possessions.

As a matter of fact, Port Curtis (Gladstone) is not only the finest harbour on the entire coast of Queensland, but ranks as a Port only second to Sydney Harbour, admitted to be the finest in the known commercial world.

Throughout Australia, the establishment of a new Port has invariably been attended by a large increment in the value of real estate in its vicinity.

In every case the enormous rise in value was attributable to the opening of railway communication.

The Central Queensland Land Corporation is now possessed of certain valuable blocks of Freehold Estate, with frontage to the Main Railway Line, and within two miles of the Municipal boundary of the town of Gladstone, the aggregate area of the land being 3,159 acres, the whole of which the Directors believe to be well adapted for the purpose of cutting up into suburban residential blocks, orange groves, farms, and areas suitable for manufactories, all such divisions of the land being certain to command a very high price in the near future.

To avoid increasing the present share capital, it has been deemed advisable to make provision for the issue of debentures not exceeding £80,000, the proceeds of which will be exclusively devoted to the acquisition of freehold estate, which is computed to bring in a net rental in excess of the interest payable on the debentures. These debentures will, in addition, be secured on the land which has already been paid for out of the capital of the Corporation.

The time for completion of the contracts for carrying the Main Trunk Line of Australasian Railways into the town of Gladstone is fixed for July, 1897, but it is more than probable the contractors will have the line opened for traffic some months sooner. Information recently received by cable from the Agent of the Corporation at Gladstone, and from other independent sources, already discloses considerable improvement in the business prospects, the value of real estate "progressing by leaps and bounds." It appears to be only a fair and reasonable assumption, considering what has happened at similar ports on the introduction of railway communication, that in four years from the commencement of traffic the realisable value of the land alone (not including mining rights) will be not less than £200 per acre. If the land be cut up into suitable blocks for residential purposes, suburban town allotments, &c., there is but little doubt the above estimate may be largely exceeded; and, indeed, it is impossible to calculate the probable future value of these holdings.

Quite enough has been adduced to indicate the nature of this Corporation, as constituting an investment, rather than a mere speculation. The following, however, may be briefly noted:—

1. The Title Deeds of the property have been conveyed direct to the Corporation, and are deposited with its Solicitors.
2. Each Shareholder is at once practically seized of an individual interest in 3,159 acres of Freehold, and any further acquisition of Real Estate.
3. After payment for the Shares there is no further liability, direct or indirect.
4. Taking the known increment of value on land contiguous to the present Ports of Brisbane, Rockhampton and Townsville as a basis for calculation, there are fair and reasonable grounds for believing that the area of land possessed by this Corporation, within a few years from the present period, will attain an average value of at least £200 per acre.
5. The recent discoveries of Gold reefs running through the freehold present large possibilities of profits in the future.
6. With the complete issue of Shares—independently of Debentures—the position of the Corporation is as follows—It is possessed of Real Estate aggregating 3,159 acres Freehold Land; several valuable "options"; and about £11,000 Cash in hand for future Investment.
7. The steady increment in the value of Queensland Coast lands makes the Shares and Debentures of this Corporation a safe investment, commending itself to Trustees, and those who wish provision made for children. As a vehicle for speculation or gambling it possesses no attraction.

Copies of the Agreements, and of the Debenture Trust Deed and Form of Debenture, together with the Certificate of Title to lands belonging to the Corporation, can be seen at the Offices of the Corporation, and of the Solicitors to the Corporation.

For Contracts, Reports, Maps, &c., see full Prospectus.

Applications for Shares or Debentures may be made on the forms accompanying the Prospectus and forwarded to the Bankers, together with a remittance for the amount payable on application, or by letter direct to the Secretary of The Acquisition Trust of Australia, Limited, 33, St. Swithin's-lane, E.C., or of Elmslie, Limited, Blomfield House, London Wall, E.C.

Copies of Full Prospectus, with reports, maps, and photographs, may be had on application to the Secretary, 33, St. Swithin's-lane, E.C. or from Elmslie, Limited, Blomfield House, E.C.

The List of Applications will Open on Wednesday, the 21st Oct., and Close on or before Friday, the 23rd Oct., 1896, at 4 p.m. for Town, and Saturday, the 24th, at Noon, for the Country and Abroad.

WM. CORY & SON, Limited.

Incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890.

SHARE CAPITAL, £2,000,000,

Divided into 170,000 5 per Cent. Preference Shares of £5 each, and 230,000 Ordinary Shares of £5 each.

Issue of 170,000 Preference Shares of £5 each,

Of which one-third will be taken by the Vendors, the balance, 113,340, being now offered for Subscription,

And Four per Cent. FIRST MORTGAGE DEBENTURE STOCK amounting to £800,000 at 103.

The Preference Shares are entitled to a Cumulative Preferential Dividend of Five per Cent. per annum, and are Preferential both as to Capital and Dividend.

The Debenture Stock will be issued in multiples of £10, and will be redeemable at £108 per cent., in whole, or in part by drawings, at the option of the Company at any time after December 31st, 1906, on six months' notice. The Stock will be secured by a Trust Deed providing for a first mortgage to the Trustees of the freehold, copyhold, and various leasehold properties, and for a floating charge on the steamers, steam-tugs, sea-going lighters, and barges, and on all the movable plant, stock, book debts, and other assets of the Company. But the Company is not to be at liberty to create any charge on its steamers or other vessels, lighters, barges, or shares in ships or in shipping, or other Companies, so as to rank in priority to, or equally with, the Debenture Stock, or to charge any of its other assets comprised in the floating charge, so that more than £50,000 at any one time shall rank in priority to, or equally with, the Debenture Stock. The Stock will be transferable in multiples of £10, and will be registered in the books of the Company. Interest will be payable half-yearly on the 1st April and 1st October in each year. The Company reserves the right to purchase the Debenture Stock in the market, for the purpose of redemption and cancellation only.

The Vendors reserve to themselves the right to take up to one-third of the Debenture Stock at the issue price, and have agreed to take one-third of the whole Preference Share Capital in part payment, in either case, of the purchase price, this being the largest proportion allowed by the Rules of the Stock Exchange to applicants for an official quotation.

The Ordinary Shares are not offered for subscription, the Vendors taking 170,000 shares in part satisfaction of the purchase price, the remaining 60,000 shares being reserved for future issue as required.

SUBSCRIPTIONS to the Issues of Debenture Stock and Preference Shares are payable as follows:—

PROSPECTUS.

NATURE AND EXTENT OF BUSINESS.

This Company has been formed to acquire, amalgamate, and carry on as one concern, from the 1st October, 1896, the English business of the following firms:

Messrs. WM. CORY & SON,	Messrs. J. & C. HARRISON,
,, LAMBERT BROS.	,, GREEN, HOLLAND & SONS,
,, D. RADFORD & CO.,	,, MANN, GEORGE, & CO.
,, BEADLE BROS. LIMITED,	,, G. J. COCKERELL & CO. LIM.

The businesses thus amalgamated are those of Coal Factors, Coal and Coke Merchants, Coal Contractors, Lightermen, Owners and Dischargers of Steam Colliers, Sea Going Lighters, and other vessels.

The extent of these businesses is shown by the fact that the combined firms deal in one or more ways in their English businesses alone with over 5,000,000 tons of coal, coke, and patent fuel per annum (according to the certificate of Messrs. J. Dix Lewis, Cæsar, & Co.), from which they derive some or all of the profits arising from the several operations of carrying, discharging, lightering, selling, &c. About six per cent. of the certified tonnage has been handled in different ways by two firms, and the tonnage so handled has been credited to each such firm in arriving at its aggregate tonnage. The tonnage certificate of Messrs. J. Dix Lewis, Cæsar, & Co. is as follows:—

85, Gresham-street, London, E.C.

To Wm. Cory & Son, Limited.

We have examined the books of the following firms, viz.:—Wm. Cory & Son; Lambert Bros.; D. Radford & Co.; Beadle Bros., Limited; J. & C. Harrison; Green, Holland, & Sons; Mann, George, & Co.; and G. J. Cockerell & Co., Limited; and we have ascertained that the tonnage of coal, coke, and patent fuel handled by them (excluding all foreign business) for the three years 1893, 1894, and 1895 has been 15,328,150 tons, showing an average of 5,108,717 tons per annum. For the period of six months ending 30th June, 1896, the tonnage has also been at the rate of over 5,000,000 tons per annum.

J. DIX LEWIS, CÆSAR, & CO., Chartered Accountants.

Signed this 24th day of September, 1896.

WM. CORY & SON, LIMITED.—Continued.

All the firms have been established for many years. The firm of Wm. Cory & Son was founded nearly a hundred years ago, and has always held the leading position in the trade. This firm was one of the first to bring coal by steamers to London, and the first to discharge the cargoes by mechanical appliances.

The working of the several businesses together as one undertaking should secure the fullest possible advantage from the special facilities which the individual firms possess for the economical handling of coal, and the efforts of the management will be directed to the cheapening of coal to the consumer, the past experience of the firms proving that cheap coal and larger tonnage are more profitable than high prices.

An extensive and valuable retail trade in house and other coal by trucks and vans is secured to the Company by the inclusion in this amalgamation of the businesses of G. J. Cockerell & Co., Limited, and D. Radford & Co.; further, Wm. Cory & Son bring with their other assets the business of the Sea Coal Co., and Lambert Bros.' assets comprise the old-established business of Davey & Son, of Blackfriars.

No Colliery or Mining risks are taken over, nor does the Company take over the Foreign and Export Departments of the combined firms from the existing coal ports of Great Britain, the Vendors remaining at liberty to carry on this foreign and export business. The trade thus excluded forms no part of the annual tonnage mentioned nor contributes to the certified profits.

The Board of the Company is composed of representative members of each of the amalgamating firms, with whom for years past the practical management of the respective businesses has rested, and the Company will have the benefit of their combined experience, and should secure the continuity of their business connections. The Company also retains the services of those employees of the amalgamating firms whose assistance the Board consider will prove of material value to the Company.

ASSETS.

Included in the assets to be taken over by the Company are:—

- Freehold Wharves at Erith, known as "Beadle's Wharves," having a deep-water Discharging Pier, Four Steamer Berths, and several miles of Sidings for making up trains for delivery on to the Railways South of the Thames.
- Thirteen Freehold, Copyhold, or Leasehold Wharves on the Thames.
- Two Floating Derricks moored in the Thames for unloading steamers, fitted with sixteen hydraulic cranes and complete Installation for Electric Light.
- Leasehold Jetties, fitted with twenty-six Hydraulic Cranes, at the Victoria Docks, Albert Docks, and Tilbury Docks, for unloading steamers.
- Engineers' Shops at Charlton and Erith, and Barge-building Works at Charlton and Brentford.
- Forty-two Coal Depots in London and Suburbs.
- Four Floating Tug Coaling Stations at Charlton, Silvertown, and Gravesend.
- The entire interest in eighteen Steamers, the controlling interest in four Steamers, and a large interest in eleven others, the total carrying capacity of these steamers being about 42,000 tons.
- Shares in Steamship and other Companies.
- Eleven Sea-going Lighters.
- Twenty-one Steam Tugs and Four Steam Launches.
- About Twelve hundred Barges, of a carrying capacity varying from 50 to 200 tons each.
- Two thousand five hundred and sixty Railway Wagons, subject to deferred payments on a portion of the Wagons as mentioned in Mr. Ball's certificate below.
- Horses and Vans.

VALUATIONS.

The Valuations mentioned below have been made in pursuance of the instructions of the amalgamating firms.

The Freeholds, Leaseholds, Wharves, Depots, Derricks, and fixed machinery have been valued by Messrs. Fuller, Horsey, & Co., who certify as follows:—

11, Billiter-square, London, E.C.

To Messrs. Wm. Cory & Son, Limited, October 5th, 1896.
52, Mark-lane, E.C.

Gentlemen,—In accordance with your instructions, we have attended at the various properties on which the businesses of Coal Factors and Merchants are carried on by Messrs. Wm. Cory & Son; Messrs. Beadle Brothers, Limited; Messrs. Lambert Brothers; Messrs. James & Charles Harrison; Messrs. G. J. Cockerell & Co., Limited; and Messrs. D. Radford & Co.; and have made a Survey and Valuation of same, together with the fixed plant, machinery, and fixtures.

The properties include freehold and leasehold wharves at Blackfriars, Erith, Dartford, Vauxhall, Nine Elms, Battersea, Wandsworth, Pimlico, Victoria and Tilbury Docks; barge-building shops and engineering works at Charlton and Brentford; two floating derricks at Charlton, and numerous railway coal wharves and sidings.

We are of opinion that the present fair value as a going concern of the above mentioned freehold and leasehold premises, together with the whole of the fixed plant, machinery, and fixtures, is the sum of three hundred and thirty thousand one hundred and seventy-two pounds (£330,172).

These figures are exclusive of any value for goodwill, and although in the coal trade it is a well-known fact that continuous occupation of a wharf or premises necessarily attaches to the property a certain proportion of the goodwill of the business, we have not allowed anything under this head, but have valued the properties on their respective merits.

We are, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,
FULLER, HORSEY, SONS, & CASSELL.

The barges, coal vans, horses, and loose plant have been valued by Messrs. Horne, Son, & Eversfield, who certify as follows:—

Messrs. Wm. Cory & Son, Limited.
85, Gresham-street, E.C., October 7th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—We hereby certify that we have made a valuation of the steel and iron and wooden lighters, horses, vans, and loose plant belonging to the following firms:—Messrs. Wm. Cory & Son; Messrs. Beadle Bros., Limited; G. J. Cockerell & Co., Limited; D. Radford & Co.; J. & C. Harrison; Lambert Bros.; Green, Holland, & Sons; Mann, George, & Co.; and are of opinion that they are worth, to a going concern, the sum of Three Hundred and Eleven Thousand Three Hundred and Thirty-nine Pounds (£311,339).

We remain, yours faithfully,
HORNE, SON, & EVERSFIELD.

The steamers, tugs, lighters, investments in shipping properties, and shares in Companies have been valued by Messrs. Bayley & Ridley, and Flannery, Baggallay & Johnson, who certify as follows:—

9, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.
October 9th, 1896.

16, London-street, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

Messrs. Wm. Cory & Son, Ltd., 52, Mark-lane, E.C.

We have carefully considered the value of the shipping and other properties, of which detailed lists accompany this certificate, belonging to the following firms:—William Cory & Son; Lambert Bros.; D. Radford & Co.; Beadle Bros., Limited; J. & C. Harrison; Green, Holland, & Sons; Mann, George, & Co.

After careful examination of steamers, steam tugs, and sea-going lighters, the entire interest of which is to be transferred to the Company, and considering Balance-sheets and profit and loss accounts of the steamers of other Companies, in which this Company acquires from the firms mentioned, various interests specified in the accompanying lists, we are of opinion that the value of the properties so to be acquired is as a going concern, but without any allowance for goodwill, three hundred and sixty-two thousand three hundred and seventy-nine pounds (say £362,379).

GEO. BAYLEY & WM. RIDLEY,
FLANNERY, BAGGALLAY, & JOHNSON.

The railway wagons have been valued by Mr. Edwin Ball, of the North Central Railway Wagon Works, Rotherham, who certifies as follows:—

Clifton Cresent, Rotherham.

To Wm. Cory & Son, Limited.

I have valued the 2,500 railway wagons belonging to the firms of Messrs. Wm. Cory & Son; Lambert Bros.; D. Radford & Co.; Beadle Bros., Limited; J. & C. Harrison; Green, Holland, & Sons; and Mann, George, & Co.; and hereby certify that the value of the same is £84,331 (eighty-four thousand three hundred and thirty-one pounds); and from this amount must be deducted the sum of £22,256 outstanding in respect of accruing deferred payments to be made on some of the wagons under the agreements under which they have been hired with the option of purchase.

The nett value of the wagons, therefore, is at the present date £62,075 say (sixty-two thousand and seventy-five pounds)

Dated this 25th day of September, 1896.

E. BALL.

In addition to the assets comprised in the above Certificates the Debenture Stock will form a floating charge upon the current book debts for the time being of the Company, and upon its stock, additional plant, working capital, and other assets. It is estimated by the Directors that the aggregate value of these items will not be less than £500,000, of which at least £150,000 will represent cash provided for the purchase of additional plant and the working capital of the Company. Neither this figure of £500,000 nor the sums mentioned in the above Certificates include any value for the goodwill.

PROFITS.

Messrs. Deloitte, Dever, Griffiths, & Co., 4, Lothbury; and Messrs. Price, Waterhouse, & Co., 54, Gresham-street, have examined the books of the eight firms for the last seven years, and they certify as follows:—

To the Directors of Wm. Cory & Son, Limited.

Gentlemen,— London, E.C., October 14th, 1896.

We have examined the books of the following firms:—Messrs. Wm. Cory & Son; Lambert Bros.; J. & C. Harrison; Beadle Bros., Ltd.; Green, Holland, & Sons; D. Radford & Co.; Mann, George, & Co.; G. J. Cockerell & Co., Ltd., for a period of seven years, the last year's accounts ending in nearly every case on 31st December, 1895: and we report that, after excluding all charges for interest and management by the partners, we find the aggregate profits of the Home Trade to have been in each year as follows:

1889	...	£165,935	11	10	1893	...	£162,272	16	8
1890	...	197,420	6	0	1894	...	106,932	16	0
1891	...	130,117	18	11	1895	...	110,741	16	8
1892	...	127,741	0	8	or an average Annual Profit of £143,023 3 9

Before arriving at the above results, we have made provision to the best of our judgment for depreciation, and wear and tear of steamers, tugs, barges, railway wagons, and plant.

We are, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,
DELOITTE, DEVER, GRIFFITHS, & Co.
PRICE, WATERHOUSE, & Co.

The Annual Profits above certified have been sufficient in each year to pay 4 per cent. on the £800,000 Debenture Stock, 5 per cent. on the £850,000 Preference Shares, and to leave an average yearly balance of £68,523 3s. 9d.

RETURNS FROM ADDITIONAL PLANT.

Subsequently to the period covered by the Certificate of Profits, additional plant, included in the assets above specified, and consisting of new steam colliers of the most modern type, sea-going lighters, powerful screw steam tugs and iron and steel barges of large carrying capacity, has been acquired by some of the Vendors. It is anticipated by the Directors that the introduction of this plant will effect a substantial increase in revenue.

PURCHASE PRICE.

The aggregate purchase price of the goodwill, assets (other than existing book debts, cash balances and stock), and undertaking of the English businesses (as on 1st October, 1896) of the eight amalgamating Firms, who are the Vendors to and the Promoters of the Company has been fixed by them at £2,374,000. The said price is to be satisfied as to £674,000 in cash, as to £850,000 in fully-paid Ordinary Shares of the Company, as to £283,300 in fully-paid Preference Shares of the Company, and as to the balance (subject to the provisions of the Agreement) in cash, the Vendors having an option, however, of taking at the issue price one-third of the Debenture Stock as fully paid in part satisfaction of this balance. The Stocks of the Vendors are to be taken over by the Company at their cost price. The Company does not take over the book debts and cash balances of the Vendors on the 1st October, 1896.

The Vendors pay all the expenses of the Registration and formation of the Company, and the issue of the Debenture Stock and Preference Shares to the public, including all valuations, printing, and advertising, and they will also bear the whole cost (including stamp duties) of the conveyance to the Company of the whole of the assets and the charges thereon in favour of the Trustees for the Debenture Stock holders.

Quotations in the Official List of the Stock Exchange will be applied for in due course for Debenture Stock and Preference Shares.

Applications for Debenture Stock and Preference Shares should be made on the forms accompanying the Prospectus, and forwarded to the Bankers of the Company, the London and County Banking Company, Limited, 21, Lombard-street, London, or any of their branches, together with a remittance for the amount payable on application.

If no allotment is made the deposit will be returned without deduction, and where the amount of Debenture Stock or the number of the Shares allotted is less than that applied for, the surplus will be credited in reduction of the amount payable on allotment, and any excess returned to the applicant. Failure to pay any instalment when due will render the previous payments liable to forfeiture.

The following Contracts have been entered into:—Between Cory F. Cory-Wright (acting under and in pursuance of the Amalgamation Agreement and Supplemental Agreement specified below) of the one part, and the Company of the other part, dated the 16th day of October, 1896, for the sale and purchase of the businesses. The Amalgamation Agreement and an Agreement Supplemental thereto, are respectively dated the 27th day of August, 1896, and the 14th day of October, 1896, and each of such Agreements is made between Cory Francis Cory-Wright, Arthur Cory Cory-Wright, Frederic Croutel Dobbing, Henry Gamman, and Dudley Cory-Wright of the 1st part; Francis Devereux Lambert, Richard John Lambert, Newton Dunn, and Gilbert Alder, Junior, of the 2nd part; Herbert George Radford, Arthur Lock Radford, and Alfred Radford, of the 3rd part; Beadle Brothers, Limited, of the 4th part; Charles Willis Harrison of the 5th part; William Miall Green, Francis Stanley Holland, and Charles Henry Holland, of the 6th part; William Woodham Mann, Sydney King George, and Frederic Raymond Pelly, of the 7th part; G. J. Cockerell & Co., Limited, of the 8th part; and the said Cory Francis Cory-Wright of the 9th part. The profits of the Vendors' English businesses between the 1st October, 1896, and the date of the Contract for sale are excepted from the sale, but the Vendors have agreed to hand over such profits to the Company, and they will be treated as part of the profits for the current year.

There are also numerous trade Contracts entered into by the various firms in carrying on their businesses, the benefit of which will accrue to the Company, and the Vendors have entered into Contracts relative to the formation and public issue of the Company, and the guaranteeing of such a sum of cash as is required for the necessary cash payments and the provision of the working Capital. Such contracts or some of them may be Contracts within Section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867. Applicants for Shares must be deemed to have had full notice thereof, and to have waived any further disclosure of all such Contracts, and to have agreed with the Company as Trustee for the Directors and other persons liable not to make any claim whatsoever or to institute any proceedings in respect of any non-compliance with the said Section or otherwise.

The Memorandum and Articles of Association, the draft trust deed, the original valuations and certificates and the above-mentioned Contract of sale and purchase may be seen at the offices of the Solicitors to the Company.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained at the offices of the Company, and at the Bankers and Brokers.

Dated October 16th, 1896.

The LIST will CLOSE at or before Four o'clock WEDNESDAY, the 21st October, 1896, for Town, and at or before Four o'clock THURSDAY, 22nd October, 1896, for the Country.

The Directors of this Company, guided by the reports of eminent practical experts, and by the results of actual tests and trials, are of opinion that the "BAGOT PNEUMATIC TYRE" is in essential respects superior to all other pneumatic tyres in the market.

PUNCTURES AND SIDE SLIPS PROVED TO BE THINGS OF THE PAST BY THE BAGOT TYRE
(This sketch of the trial tests appeared in a London Weekly).

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company is formed to purchase and acquire the Patent Rights, both for England and elsewhere, and to manufacture, grant licences, work and trade in respect of:—

1. An Improved Pneumatic Tyre for use with the wheels of velocipedes and other vehicles;
2. An Improved Detachable Puncture-proof Band for use with pneumatic tyres;
3. An Improved Non-return Lock Valve for use with pneumatic tyres.

The first invention consists of a detachable indiarubber tyre, or covering, constructed upon an entirely new principle of layers of rubber of graduated degrees of vulcanisation. It is claimed that this new principle, in conjunction with an equally novel form of "tread," secures, without any increase of selling price or weight, the following among other salient advantages and improvements, viz.:—

1. A normal tread, greatly narrowed and permanently retained.
2. A perfect immunity from side-slipping.
3. Reduced liability to cut or puncture.
4. Increase of speed, resiliency, and durability.
5. Much less splashing or clogging of mud.
6. The use of a deeper cushion of compressed air under the wheel.

The second invention consists of a readily detachable puncture-proof band of novel construction, applicable to almost every form of pneumatic tyre.

The third invention consists of a non-return lock valve of novel and simple construction, which has been proved by practical experience to be much easier to manipulate than other valves.

The Bagot Pneumatic Tyre Company, Limited, has entered into a contract with a Company holding a licence granted by predecessors in business of the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company, Limited, for the manufacture and sale of Pneumatic Tyres, under which contract the Company holding the licence has agreed to supply the Bagot Pneumatic Tyre Company, Limited, with Pneumatic Tyres manufactured according to the Patent No. 6,513, of 1896, and having wired attachments manufactured under the above-mentioned licence.

The consideration for all the Patent Rights for the United Kingdom and abroad in respect of the above-named inventions has been fixed by the vendor at £125,000, payable as to £40,000 in cash, and as to the balance in cash or shares at the option of Directors, leaving £75,000 available for working capital.

The contract of sale provides that the vendor pays all preliminary expenses of this Company (except registration fees and stamps and stamp-duty on the purchase contract) up to and including the first allotment of shares.

Copies of the Prospectus, with Forms of Application for shares, can be obtained at the Registered Offices of the Company, or at its Bankers', Brokers', and Solicitors'.

A FEW PRESS OPINIONS.

The Sporting Life, June 6th, 1896.

"A New Tyre.—Yesterday a new pneumatic tyre was tried. It is called the 'Bagot.' Some interesting tests were made in the riding school of Singer's establishment on the Holborn-viaduct. The floor was wetted and otherwise made greasy and slippery. A rider made eight and ten-foot circles on this substance, and there was not the slightest semblance of slipping. Then an ordinary tyre was tried, and this showed unmistakable symptoms of side slipping. One of the severest tests that the tyre was subjected to was the riding over a board upon which pieces of broken bottles and wire nails had been fixed. The tyre bounded off these things, leaving not the slightest semblance of puncture."

The Daily Mail, June 6th, 1896.

"Besides riding 'The Bagot' Tyre on the road, I yesterday had an opportunity of seeing it tested under singularly unfavourable circumstances. Mr. Bagot has invented a puncture-proof device, which can be fitted to his tyre if necessary, and on this occasion this was placed inside the outer cover. Then the tyre was ridden some forty or fifty times over a board studded with nails and pieces of broken glass, and not once did the air escape. The tyre was afterwards run through water, and when it emerged, and ran on asphalte, those present were able to see how very narrow the tread of 'The Bagot' really is."

CAPITAL - - £1,000,000,

Divided into 500,000 Five per Cent. Cumulative Preference Shares of £1 each, and 500,000 Ordinary Shares of £1 each (the whole of which are taken by the Vendors).

Issue of 500,000 Five per Cent. Cumulative Preference Shares of £1 each.

The Preference Shares will be entitled to a fixed Cumulative Preference Dividend of 5 per Cent., payable half-yearly, and will rank as to Capital in priority to the Ordinary Shares. The books will be made up to 1st November in each year. The first Interim Dividend will be payable on 1st May, 1897, and will be calculated from dates of payment.

The Shares will be payable as follows:—2s. 6d. per Share on Application; 5s. per Share on Allotment; 12s. 6d. per Share on 1st December next.

The whole amount may be paid on Allotment, and in that case it will rank for Dividend from date of payment.

The Articles of Association provide that no debentures can be created without the consent of three-fourths majority of the holders of the Preference Shares present in person or by proxy at a meeting specially summoned for the purpose, and that after payment of the Dividends upon the Preference Shares, there shall be set aside annually the sum of £10,000 to a Reserve Fund, until that sum amounts to £100,000, and thenceforward £5,000 a year until the same fund amounts to £200,000, the sums set apart to be invested in securities authorised by the Articles of Association; and it is also provided that in the event of a sale of the undertaking to another Company, the Preference Shareholders will be liable to redemption at the rate of 25s. for each £1 Share held.

PROSPECTUS.

THIS Company is formed for the purpose of purchasing, carrying on, and extending the business of Periodical and Magazine Proprietors, Publishers and Printers, founded by Mr. Alfred C. Harmsworth, and conducted by him and by Mr. Harold Harmsworth on behalf of Answers Publications, Limited, and three private concerns carried on as limited companies, and known as the Geraldine Press, Limited, the Pandora Publishing Company, Limited, and the Periodical Publishing Corporation, Limited.

The proportions to which the several businesses have attained, and the inconvenience of carrying on what is practically the same business by four separate Corporations, have induced the present proprietors to amalgamate the whole in one concern and make the present issue.

The Company will acquire the leasehold premises in Tudor Street and Whitefriars Street, with the extensive and complete printing plant and machinery thereon, the stock of paper owned by and the book debts owing in the above businesses, the goodwill of Answers Publications, Limited, the Geraldine Press, Limited, the Pandora Publishing Company, Limited, and the Periodical Publishing Corporation, Limited, including the following fourteen well-known and highly successful Periodicals and Magazines, originated by Alfred C. Harmsworth:—

"Answers," "Home Chat," "Forget Me Not," "The Sunday Companion," "Sunday Stories," "The Marvel," "The Boy's Friend," "Home Sweet Home," "Chips," "Union Jack," "Comic Cuts," "Comic Home Journal," "The Wonder," and "Pluck."

The total circulation of the above weekly publications considerably exceeds 3,000,000 copies per week.

The Company will also acquire the goodwill of Messrs. Harmsworth as Publishers of Periodicals and Magazines, other than newspapers of a political character.

The business was originally established by Mr. Alfred C. Harmsworth in 1888, when "Answers" was first produced. Since that date the business has grown by rapid strides, and has now reached its present commanding position, and, it is believed, will increase largely in the future. Mr. Alfred C. Harmsworth at an early date associated with himself in the management his brother, Mr. Harold Harmsworth. The other Directors have for some time been actively engaged in the management of various branches of the business. Mr. Alfred C. Harmsworth, Mr. Harold Harmsworth and the other Directors will act as Managers of the Company without remuneration, they being content with the dividends anticipated to be received on the Ordinary Shares of the Company, the benefits from which will almost entirely accrue to themselves.

The business has been built up and strengthened by the establishment from time to time of new periodicals, and it is intended to adopt that practice in the future, as occasion may seem favourable. Messrs. Harmsworth have entered into an Agreement with the Company not to start or be interested in any Periodical or Magazine except for the benefit of the Company, but they reserve to themselves the right to continue to conduct the political Newspapers in which they are at present interested, or to conduct or acquire an interest in any newspapers of similar character.

Messrs. Harmsworth have never published a Periodical or Magazine which has not proved a success, and every Periodical or Magazine, as well as each branch of the businesses now to be acquired by the Company, is earning a handsome and increasing profit.

In the year 1893 Messrs. Harmsworth started a Printing business, which is included in the present purchase by the Company. This business now produces thirteen of the periodicals to be acquired by the Company. The profits of the printing business alone have been considerable, and the profits made by the periodicals themselves have also been enhanced thereby. The valuable printing plant and machinery so acquired is considered to be the most complete of its character in the United Kingdom.

Mr. E. Layton Bennett has audited the books of the several businesses purchased from their inception, and the following Certificate by him shows how remarkable and continuous has been the success attained:—

Bishopsgate House, 55 and 56, Bishopsgate Street, London, E.C.,
To the Directors of Harmsworth Brothers, Limited. 15th October, 1896.

Gentlemen,—I have continuously audited the books of Answers Publications, Limited, the Pandora Publishing Company, Limited, the Periodical Publishing Corporation, Limited, and the Geraldine Press, Limited, since their inception, and I beg to certify that the net profits for the three first-named Companies during the four years ending 31st March, 1893, amounted to £78,951; but, owing to the fact that each Company was started at different periods from 1888 to 1891, it would be a matter of difficulty to give the net profits for a specified financial period.

I also beg to certify to the net profits for the three financial periods ending 31st May, 1896, and for the three months ending 31st August, 1896.

In each financial year the accounts of Answers Publications, Limited, were made up to the 31st May, while those of the Pandora Publishing Company, Limited, and Periodical Publishing Corporation, Limited, were made up to 31st March in 1894, and 31st May in the two subsequent years. The trading account of the Geraldine Press, Limited, commenced after 31st May, 1894.

The profits of the first three Companies for the financial year 1893-94 were	£59,185	15	0
The profits of the four Companies to 31st May, 1895 (which included 14 months' trading in the case of the Pandora Publishing Company, Limited, and the Periodical Publishing Corporation, Limited) amounted to	73,271	7	1
The profits of the four Companies for twelve months to 31st May, 1896, were	107,120	0	3
And for the three months ending 31st August, 1896, were	31,727	15	8

The above net profits have been arrived at after charging all outgoings for working expenses, depreciation on machinery, plant, &c., and also the whole cost of establishing new periodicals, but is exclusive of income tax charged in each year.

Yours faithfully,
E. LAYTON BENNETT.

The Books for the last three years have been examined by Messrs. Turquand Youngs & Co., and they have given the following Certificate:—

41, Coleman Street, E.C., 15th October, 1896.

To the Directors of Harmsworth Brothers, Limited.

Gentlemen,—We have examined the books of Answers Publications, Limited, the Pandora Publishing Company, Limited, the Periodical Publishing Corporation, Limited, and the Geraldine Press, Limited, for three financial periods up to 31st May, 1896, and for the three months to 31st August, 1896.

In each financial year the accounts of Answers Publications, Limited, were made up to 31st May, while those of the Pandora Publishing Company, Limited, and the Periodical Publishing Corporation, Limited, were made up to 31st March, 1894, and 31st May, in the two subsequent years. The trading account of the Geraldine Press, Limited, commenced after 31st May, 1894.

The profits of the first three Companies for the financial year 1893-4 were	£59,185	15	0
The profits of the four Companies to 31st May, 1895, which included 14 months trading in the case of the Pandora Publishing Company, Limited, and the Periodical Publishing Corporation, Limited, amounted to	73,271	7	1
The profits of the four Companies for 12 months to 31st May, 1896, were	107,120	0	3
And for the three months ending 31st August, 1896	31,727	15	8

The above profits are stated before income tax is charged.—Yours faithfully, TURQUAND, YOUNGS, BISHOP & CLARKE.

The above figures show that the clear net profits, after deducting all outgoings for working expenses, depreciation of machinery, plant, &c., and also the whole cost of establishing new periodicals, have amounted during the last financial year to £107,120 0s. 3d., thus being more than four times the sum required to pay the Preference Dividend, while for the past three months of the present financial year the net profits have been at a still greater rate, viz., £126,911 per annum.

The Preference Shares now offered for subscription are Cumulative as to Dividend and Preferential as to Capital, and it is provided by the Articles of Association that no Debentures or Debenture Stock can be created without the consent of a three-fourths majority of the holders present in person or by proxy at a meeting specially summoned. The Preference Shares, will, therefore, practically be a first charge upon one of the most successful and progressive businesses in the United Kingdom. The Preference Shares will be liable to redemption as provided by the Articles of Association.

The holders of Preference Shares will not be entitled to vote at General Meetings of the Company unless the Preference Dividend shall not have been paid, or unless a matter directly or indirectly affecting their interest as against any other class of shareholders or in respect of any proposed Debenture issued be under discussion, but they shall have no power to vote upon a proposal involving the redemption of their shares, provided the proposal secure to them the payment of 25s. for each £1 share held.

The Company will take over the businesses as going concerns as on the 1st day of November, 1896, together with the stock in hand and book debts, the Vendors paying the liabilities. A sufficient working capital will thereby be provided; but in view of further extension of the business, a sum of £25,000 will be set aside out of the present issue as additional working capital.

The purchase price has been fixed by the present Owners of the businesses who are the only Promoters, at £975,000, of which £475,000 will be paid in cash and the balance by the allotment of the whole of the Ordinary Shares credited as fully paid up.

The following Contracts have been entered into, all dated the 16th day of October, 1896:—between (1) Answers Publications, Limited, of the one part, and the Company of the other part; (2) The Pandora Publishing Company, Limited, of the one part, and the Company of the other part; (3) The Periodical Publishing Corporation, Limited, of the one part, and the Company of the other part; (4) The Geraldine Press, Limited, of the one part, and the Company of the other part: and (5) Alfred Charles William Harmsworth, Harold Sidney Harmsworth, Cecil B. Harmsworth, Robert Leicester Harmsworth, and Hildebrand A. Harmsworth, of the one part, and the Company of the other part. The Company acquires the benefit of the existing contracts entered into by the several Vendors in the ordinary course of business, which are too numerous to specify. Subscribers will therefore be deemed to waive the insertion of the dates and names of parties to such contracts and any further compliance with section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, than herein appearing, and applications for shares will only be entertained on that footing.

The Vendors, who are the only promoters, will pay all expenses relating to the formation of the Company up to the allotment of Preference Shares, and Messrs. Harmsworth, on behalf of the Vendors, have entered into arrangements or contracts accordingly with various persons, and the waiver mentioned in the last clause must be deemed to apply to such arrangements and contracts.

Copies of the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company, the above-mentioned Contracts, and the Auditors' Certificates may be seen at the Offices of the Solicitors of the Company.

Application will in due course be made to the Committee of the Stock Exchange to grant a settlement and quotation.

Applications for shares should be made on the accompanying form, and forwarded to the Company's Bankers, together with a remittance for the amount payable on application. Cheques should be made payable to Coutts & Co. If the number of shares allotted be less than that applied for, the surplus will be credited towards the amount payable on allotment. When no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full.

Prospectuses and forms of application will be found in the current number of "Answers," or may be obtained from the Bankers, Solicitors, and Brokers, and at the Offices of the Company.

Dated 15th October, 1896.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2. 2s. will be given every week for the best Epigram, Conundrum, Lipogram, Bouts-Rimés, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and, for obvious reasons, no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the Truth Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a Quarter to the same competitor.

7. All New Contributors are Required to Forward with their First Answers their Real Names and Addresses for Registration; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed 12, and must under no circumstances consist of more than 14, letters.

9. Competitors must on no account change their noms-de-plume they have once assumed.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed—

SPECIAL NOTICE.—THE "TRUTH" DOLL AND TOY SHOW.

To prevent any misunderstanding on the subject let me state here that the Truth Show at Christmas will, as usual, comprise Home-made Toys of all kinds as well as Dressed Dolls. It is hoped that the supply of the former will show no falling-off either in number or variety. From the first Home-made Toys have formed a most interesting feature of the Truth Shows, and this year a table will be specially devoted to their exhibition. Experience has taught us that no toys are more warmly welcomed at the Hospitals and Workhouse Schools of the Metropolis than those which have been both designed and made by the donors. They are frequently stronger and more fitted to withstand the wear and tear of the Workhouse School and Hospital Ward than the more fragile articles of the Toy-shop. As to the description of the toys required there is literally no limit to the variety which may be sent. Model Toys of all kinds, Mechanical Toys, Dolls' Houses, Wheelbarrows, Scrap-books, Games—are but a few of the things which may be sent. Out of the numerous valuable prizes which will be awarded in connection with the Exhibition a fair proportion will be given for the best Home-made Toys.

Our last stock-taking shows that there is still a supply of dolls left of both sizes: though the number is now considerably reduced. The large dolls, it may be repeated, are about 39 in. high and the small ones 12 in. Contributions to the Fund for the purchase of the 25,000 new Toys, which will be required for the Christmas distribution are earnestly requested.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 921.

It may be well to explain on what principle the subjoined award is made. In dealing with the numerous answers received, it was found necessary to classify to some extent the various kinds of sentences which were sent in. In the first place it was thought well to eliminate those which merely announced a fact such as "'Tis atrocious misrule," "A very hopeless muddle," &c. Then came the very large class of sentences which addressed declamatory advice to the Cabinet of a kind that must be considered impracticable, to say the very least. Under this heading came the very numerous sentences of the "Dethrone the Assassin!" "Eject Armenia's tyrant" description. These duly eliminated, there still remained many sentences in which the advice addressed to the Cabinet was of a more discreet and less declamatory kind, and from this residuum the Prize sentence was selected, viz., that sent by Dormer, "Co-operate with Russia," a piece of advice which the trend of public opinion shows has not been without its weight with her Majesty's advisers. It may be mentioned that several other competitors sent sentences which expressed more or less directly a similar view of the situation, but it was considered that Dormer's expressed it most neatly, and the Prize has therefore been awarded to him.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 926.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered this week for

The Best Original Conundrum of a Topical Description.

By the word "topical," it is meant to imply that the riddles must refer to some subject of current interest. Competitors are not limited to one conundrum, but must in no instance send in more than five; and in all cases the answers should accompany them. It would be well, too, for the answers to be so written that they can easily be detached from the questions for convenience of printing. All conundrums must reach me by the morning of Monday, November 2, at the latest.

Answers to Correspondents.

 The real name, with the address, of Candlemas, winner of a half of Prize No. 920, is Miss K. M. Loudon, Springbank, North Berwick, N.B.

Hibernian.—There is good reason for the suggestion you make, and I thank you for your letter.

Chica.—Quite so. Your sentence should have read "The Sick Man's last gasp."

Gallina, Impérieuse, and Powelchere.—Your answers to Puzzle No. 921 arrived in good time.

Pig Tail.—I have noted your correction.

Orlando.—I much regret your mistake, the more so as I fear it must entail disqualification.

Sandades.—Will you let me have your present address, with a view to the setting to music of the words of the song written by you for this page about a year ago?

Apostrophe.—You will find your anagram included.

Qu'Appelle.—Many thanks for your letter and the suggestions it contains. It was thought best, after due consideration, not to make a second competition out of No. 922.

Makmax. — I now quite understand the genesis of your nom de plume, and hope there will be no further misprint of it.

La Flèche.—There was insufficient space to print all your answers. Four sentences, however, were duly received from you.

Musmé.—Many thanks for your note.

Pelican.—The omission of your sentences was not intentional, as they were certainly quite up to the average merit of those published.

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

ENTRE NOUS.

ONE of the functions at Buckingham Palace during the festivities of next June will be a Diplomatic and Official Court, which the Queen is to hold in the ball-room, for the reception of a large number of personages "of light and leading" who will be invited by the Lord Chamberlain. It is highly probable that this Court will be an evening function, instead of being held in the afternoon.

The Gaulois is not the sort of journal where any rational being would seek for correct information as to the arrangements and projects of the British Court. But the evening papers ingenuously printed on Friday an extract from their Paris contemporary, stating that "all Sovereigns and Chiefs of States" will be invited to London next June for the Court festivities. There is no foundation whatever for the statement, which is a pure invention. No "Sovereigns and Chiefs of States" are to be invited, and it is utterly untrue that either the German Emperor, the Emperor of Austria, or the Czar are then coming to London, but they will be represented by members of their respective families. In this respect the precedent of 1887 is to be followed.

The Prince of Wales is staying at Newmarket until Friday. The Princess has gone to Sandringham until November 23, when H.R.H. and the Prince and Princess Victoria are to proceed to Blenheim on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough, whose house-party will include Lord and Lady Londonderry, Mr. Balfour, Lord Curzon and Lady Georgiana Curzon, Lord Chesterfield, Lady Randolph Churchill, Mr. and Mrs. George Curzon, and Mr. Chaplin.

All the arrangements of the Prince and Princess of Wales for Sandringham hospitalities and country-house visits depend upon the health of Prince George of Hanover, eldest son of the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland, who is in a very dangerous condition.

Prince and Princess Charles of Denmark are to reside at Appleton House, near Sandringham, until the second week in December, when they will proceed to Copenhagen for a stay of several months.

The Duke of Coburg, who is to arrive at Clarence House this evening from Darmstadt (travelling by the Ostend route), will proceed to Sandringham on November 7 on a visit to the Prince and Princess of Wales, and he is to stay in England until the end of next month.

A contemporary referred the other day to Prince Philip of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha (who has been entertaining the Duke and Duchess of Connaught at his country seat in Hungary) as the next heir to the throne of Coburg and the large settled estates which appertain to it, failing the Hereditary Prince. As a matter of fact, the next heir is the Duke of Connaught, then his son Prince Arthur, then the Duke of Albany, and only on the failure of the English male line would Prince Philip succeed.

The Duchess of Connaught, who has been suffering severely from rheumatism, is at present undergoing a course of massage at Dresden, where she will stay for three weeks in order to complete her cure.

Prince Christian, who has been in Germany for nearly three months, returned on Saturday to Windsor from visiting the German Emperor and Empress at the Neue Palais, Potsdam. Princess Christian, who has been for some time staying at Cumberland Lodge, had previously been joined by Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein from Balmoral, and by Prince and Princess Aribert of Anhalt, from Dessau.

A writer in America, discoursing on the results o inter-marrying, gives an appalling list of the diseases and deformities with which various members of European Royal Houses are afflicted, owing to this cause. From mere facial deformity up to insanity, there is scarcely any distressing affliction with which humanity is afflicted which does not find a place in the list. Very possibly this catalogue may be incorrect, but experience unquestionably proves the fact that there is a degeneration in Royal families. To a certain extent this may be due to intermarriages, but I suspect that it is still more due to the species of cult that is paid to Royalties from generation to generation, and which must in the nature of things weaken their intellectual fibre. Nothing can be more mentally injurious for a man than to have all his wishes anticipated by a crowd of sycophants, and through life to find all agreeing with him with whom he is brought in daily contact, instead of being subjected to the discipline involved in social equality. Just as we have lost the tails that were the appendages of our primeval ancestors because gradually the habit of wagging them fell into disuse, so all mental virility gradually disappears from those families that are long regal, because they have no opportunity to exercise it.

Mr. G. Balfour arrived last week at the Chief Secretary's Lodge, Phœnix Park, where he will stay for some time. Business is slack at Dublin Castle, as it is everywhere at this season. An Irish Secretary, however, is never in danger of incurring any evil that might result from "idle hands." Mr. Balfour is a close attendant at his office in Dublin Castle. Before the Phœnix Park murders and the disturbed years in Ireland, the Chief Secretary's Lodge used to be, with the Viceregal Lodge and the Royal Hospital, Kilmainham, the leading social centres of Irish Society. It was the usage to give the balls and entertainments at the Chief Secretary's Lodge before those of the Castle season began, and generally before Christmas. Of late years Chief Secretaries have given up the lighter official duties of ball-giving, and dinner parties have been the only form of entertainment patronised by them. Mr. A. J. Balfour, during his tenure of office in Ireland gave one large ball. It was not held in his official residence, but in Dublin Castle, the Lord-Lieutenant lending St. Patrick's Hall for the occasion.

Lord and Lady Dufferin have returned to Ireland to take up their residence at Clandeboye, co. Down, from which, except for an occasional short visit, they have been long absent. Lord Dufferin's return is being celebrated by a public banquet in Belfast. Lord Dufferin was unable to be present at the conferring of the degrees of the Royal Irish University, of which he is the President, last week. Mr. C. Redington, the Vice-President, took the leading part in the ceremonial, and made an excellent speech. This University boasts a large number of girl graduates. The Princess of Wales on her last visit to Ireland received the musical doctor's degree, one of her prettiest photographs representing her in the academic dress of the Royal University.

The "Kingdom of Kerry" went through many vicissitudes in old historic days. Another army of invaders is likely to sweep over it soon, bringing prosperity, however, in their track. Cyclists have found out Kerry. This most picturesque county possesses admirable roads; the hotels, too, are excellent, and demonstrate the fact of the great progress made in the Irish tourist industry. The weather, unfortunately, this year cut short the tourist season, but Ireland was not more unlucky in that way than many other countries.

There is at least one advantage of being in the sere and yellow leaf. A good deal of the forgotten past is remembered. It may surprise the Navy League, whatever that League may be beyond being decorators of Trafalgar-square on the anniversary of Nelson's victory, that British patriotism, more generous in words than in cash, declined to find the money to complete the Trafalgar monument, and that this so shocked the Czar Nicholas, when he visited the Queen in 1842, that he provided it. I shall have a higher opinion of the League when I hear that its members have subscribed the amount necessary to build a battleship, instead of the more modest sum requisite to put a British garland round the Russian monument to the British hero.

I am no great believer in the celebration of victories, unless it be a dinner or something of that sort amongst the survivors. The tendency of such functions is to perpetuate ill-feeling between nations. We all know what happened at Trafalgar, and we are proud of the pluck of our sailors. But why swagger about it? What should we say to a Scotch commemoration of Bannockburn, or a Dutch celebration of the burning of Chatham, or a Boer national festival to keep alive the memory of Majuba Hill?

If we must have celebrations of this kind, it would be better, I should have thought, to keep the day on which we made peace than the day on which we defeated the enemy. By celebrating the Treaties of 1815 or 1856 we should be reminded not only of our victories and sacrifices, but of the results, if any, which we gained by them. Better still would it be, as a philosopher suggests to me, to celebrate the achievements of peace, or any events which have tended to promote international friendship, such as the opening of the first railway in England, the passage of the first steamboat from England to France, or the signing of the first Arbitration Treaty between England and America.

Lord Rosebery, who is going abroad for the winter and spring months, has been staying in Kent with Lord Gerard at Eastwell Park, near Ashford; and with his cousin, Lord Stanhope, at Chevening Park, near Sevenoaks. Lord Rosebery has just obtained leave from the Court of Session to disentail his family estates in the counties of Edinburgh and Linlithgow.

A marriage has been arranged, and will shortly take place, between Mary Caroline Duchess of Sutherland and Sir Albert Kaye Rollit, M.P.

On the occasion of Sir W. MacCormac's election as President of the Royal College of Surgeons, a number of his friends in London resolved to show their regard for him by having his portrait painted for presentation to the Queen's College, where he was educated, at the celebration of its jubilee next year. The project was warmly taken up by former students of Queen's College and former pupils of Sir William's. A Committee was formed, with the Marquis of Dufferin and Sir D. Barbour as Chairman and Vice-Chairman, and Sir J. Dick, M.D., as Hon. Treasurer, and arrangements for the sittings were completed, when they had to be put off by Sir William's sudden illness. He is now out of danger, and it is still hoped that the portrait may be ready by January, when the jubilee celebrations at Belfast are to take place. The Hon. Secretary of the Committee is Mr. J. Andrew Strahan, 3, Brick-court, Temple.

I see it stated that the International Sleeping Car Company is making its arrangements for the winter. I would make this suggestion to them. They have a sleeping car between Bâle and Calais and vice versâ. But a considerable number of people go on from Bâle to Lausanne, en route to Geneva or to Territet, which latter place is every year cram-full of English. It is possible to leave the sleeping car at Dellemont and to take a train that reaches Lausanne at about 8 a.m. But to do this it is necessary to get out of the sleeping car at about 5 a.m. Therefore most of the passengers go on in the sleeping car to Bâle, wait there an hour, then take a train that brings them to Lausanne at about one o'clock. Why not, then, once a week let the sleeping car run from Dellemont on to Lausanne? I have often used the Bâle sleeping car in winter, but very seldom is it above half full, mainly, I imagine, because English go to all parts of the Lake of Geneva viâ Paris. This is the quickest route at present. But it is a disagreeable one in winter because there is no sleeping car; passengers are changed about from carriage to carriage en route; and very often owing to the snow, the French train is delayed for hours.

A second suggestion that I would make to the Sleeping Car Company is, that the designer of the cars should devote his energies to find some way to make separate compartments for one person; or, in default of this, that the Company should come to some arrangement with the Continental Railway Companies by which a person wishing to be alone should be able to be so on reasonable extra payment. As it is, not only has he to pay for two berths, which is reasonable, but also for two railroad fares, which is unreasonable. It is disagreeable to be boxed up for a night in a sleeping berth with some perfectly unknown person. I once found myself in a sleeping car with an unknown lady—not in the bloom of youth. She glared at me, and asked me whether I contemplated going to bed. I assured her that this was my intention; on which she said that she could not be a witness to anything so indecent, and vanished—where I never knew. I sympathised with the lady, but why had I taken a berth? Certainly not to sit up all night.

I see that a fashionably-dressed widow has been committed for trial on the charge of stealing some plated candlesticks from the Colwyn Bay Hotel. I know nothing as to her guilt or innocence, nor if I did should I make my views public, as the case is sub judice. But the defence urged was a curious one. She was a Lady of the Manor in Salop, and she had recently presented a clergyman to a living. That a Lady of a Manor or the patron of a living should be above all suspicion of breaking the law is, indeed, a curious assumption.

At Leopardstown Races last August a lady picked up a five-pound note, and promptly handed it to an R.I.C. man, who was on duty, giving him at the same time her own name and address. A few weeks later she wrote to the Commandant at Dublin to inquire what had become of the note. The answer was that no owner had come forward, and that by law the note would remain in the hands of the police for twelve months, when it would probably be paid over to the Chancellor of the Exchequer under the provisions of 37 & 38 Vic., cap. 80, sec. 9. This section is as follows:—

> Where any money shall be found and delivered to a constable, then at the expiration of twelve months, during which no owner thereof claims the same, it shall be lawful for the Inspector-General to pay over the amount] thereof to her Majesty's Exchequer.

If her Majesty's Exchequer comes into any appreciable sum by the operation of this statute, it proves that either the Irish are an exceptionally honest race, or that the provisions of the law are very little understood.

One of the saddest cases I have heard of persecution by street musicians is that of a gentleman in the West End, whose misfortune it was to live next door to a lady who made a point of giving a shilling to every organ-grinder who struck up at her house. For a long time the victim suffered in silence, until he was driven to the verge of insanity, when he organised a regular system of raiding the organ-grinders—he or his butler, or both, lying in wait and dashing out upon each musician that appeared, like Miss Trotwood and her maid swooping on the donkey-boys. Every sufferer will be pleased to hear that at the end of a month the raider found that no organ-grinder entered the street. He also reports, and the fact should be recorded to the credit of the organ-grinding fraternity, that though they occasionally abused him, the musicians never failed to decamp when ordered and he never once had to invoke the assistance of the police. Really, it seems to me that householders have the remedy in their own hands, and if the nuisance flourishes it is only because the vast majority do not feel it sufficiently to take the trouble to stop it.

There is one way, however, in which I think the strong arm of the law might reasonably limit the organ-grinding nuisance. That is, as I remarked last week, by enacting a close time for organs. If street music were only permitted, say, from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m., the affliction would be deprived of the worst part of its sting, which I take to be the striking up of a barrel organ in your neighbourhood at 10 or 11 p.m. An enactment of this kind would only be a statutory limitation of the hours of labour, and as such should be welcomed by organ-grinders themselves. Let us, then, unite in a movement to secure a twelve hours' work day for organ-grinders and a twelve hours' night's rest for ourselves.

About six months ago I took the liberty of pointing out to Captain Walford-Gosnall the desirability of issuing some detailed report and accounts in connection with the Mount Maskall Home for Horses, of which he is the proprietor. As the Captain makes up his accounts from Michaelmas to Michaelmas, and is therefore very probably engaged at the present moment on his new balance-sheet, it seems a good opportunity to remind him of this advice. The last statement of account issued, dated up to September 30, 1895, bore no auditor's signature, and no indication as to who was responsible for it. It acknowledged receipts to the amount of £284. 1s. 4d., of which £251. 18s. 10d. came from subscriptions and donations, the remainder being made up of payments for horses accommodated at the Home. The working expenses, included £60. 7s. 6d. for "corn, hay, and pasturage," £72. 16s. for "men's wages," and £91. 18s. 11d. for "incidental expenses." No information was given as to the number of distressed horses relieved, so that no means were afforded of judging how far the subscriptions had been wisely and economically administered; but the expenditure of £91 on printing, stationery, stamps, &c., in connection with so small an undertaking, does not suggest the most favourable conclusions as to the Captain's administrative abilities. Seeing, too, that the horses are received on the Captain's own farm, and that he is ostensibly performing this work out of charity, the charge for "pasturage" also seems to need explanation. I trust that in the forthcoming balance-sheet all these points will be satisfactorily explained.

I have just been informed of a sequel to the remarkable story of landlord tyranny on the part of Mr. J. T. Mills, J.P., at Hillborough, Norfolk, which I published on September 10. It may be remembered that Mr. Mills was accused of having threatened to dismiss a man and woman whom he employed as caretakers at Hillborough Hall if they ventured to allow their daughter, a girl about to be discharged from a lunatic asylum, to live either at the Hall or at any house in the village of Hillborough. The latest development of the affair is that these people have received notice to quit, and I hear that on inquiring the reason they were told to ask the Editor of Truth. This would seem scarcely credible if it were not for the insight into Mr. Mills' character as a landlord and employer which has been afforded by his previous proceedings. I invited him before to favour me with any explanation he might care to give, but he made no response, and I do not suppose that he is likely to accept a similar invitation now, though, if he will, my columns are at his disposal. If, however, it is a fact that these poor people have been turned adrift owing to the paragraphs which appeared in Truth, I beg to assure Mr. Mills that he is doing them a grievous injustice. Personally I do not feel much sympathy for them, for it seemed to me that they showed a lamentable lack of natural feeling and affection in their servile observance of the behests of their employer in regard to their unfortunate child. But it is only right to say that they were not my informants, and that I have not at any time had any communication with them.

Since the outcry which was raised two or three months back, it has seemed as though the threatened interference with the public right of access to the Giant's Causeway had been discreetly abandoned. It turns out, however, that instead of going on with the proposed erection of railings and barricades (which would have been promptly demolished) the company, which claims to have acquired the Causeway, is suing three individuals for trespass and the whole question will be fought out in the Court of Chancery. This is, after all, the best way of settling it, and the Defence Committee which has been formed will, doubtless, be backed up with ample funds in their efforts to maintain the rights of way which the public have enjoyed at the Giant's Causeway from time immemorial.

I must apologise to the Carbery Hunt, individually and collectively. It turns out that the two tame deer advertised for sale because they "know this country too well," are not complained of for making the course too stiff, but on the contrary, because they have developed too great a fondness for the Queen's highway. Now that they have got to know the roads, the two sagacious beasts find the going so much more comfortable that they absolutely decline to strike across country. I don't blame them, especially when they find that the hunt has no fancy for a canter along a few miles of turnpike road. There is a little point that I should like to know now, however, and that is why this particular failing of the two animals was not mentioned when they were offered for sale. Did the vendors seriously suppose that there are some hunts which would prefer a couple of deer warranted never to run off the road? If such can be found, that will be the hunt for me when I take up this noble sport.

An idea, which may commend itself to sporting circles, has occurred to me in this connection. Why should not some bicycle club purchase these two discarded roadsters from the Carbery Hunt and organise a Bicycle Deer Hunt? Many suggestions have been made for the utilisation of bikes for hunting. Here is a chance which may not occur again.

A Yorkshire farmer has lately had an agreeable experience of the eccentricities of the English land system. Some time after taking possession of his farm he received a demand from an office in London for payment of his share of a "fee farm rent," or Crown rent, chargeable upon an estate of which his holding formed part. He had heard nothing of any such charge when taking the farm, and on requesting an explanation, he was informed that the charge was part of an ancient Crown rent upon all lands of this particular township, which had been sold by auction by virtue of 22 Charles II., cap. 6, with all the rights and powers of recovery attaching to it, and had thus passed into the hands of the present owner. The solicitors having charge of the matter professed their ability to prove the regular collection and payment of the rent for the last 200 years. They asserted a right to collect the whole of the rent due, which seems to have amounted to three years' arrears, at the rate of £16. 15s. 2¾d., per annum, from any individual properly liable, but they very considerately agreed to accept from this particular tenant an apportionment of the rent, amounting to 7s. 8½d. per annum, or £1. 3s. 1½d. for three years.

To anybody of antiquarian tastes this survival of an ancient Crown rent upon freehold property may be a highly interesting fact; but the unfortunate farmer, not being an antiquary, regarded the claim as an impudent imposition, and has been doing his best to ascertain whether he is justified in resisting it. I should think that it might be a troublesome matter for the owner of such a rent to prove his claim in a court of law; but whether it may be worth anybody's while to contest his rights over a question of 7s. 8½d. per annum is a different matter. It is a monstrous thing, however, that a demand of this nature should be sprung upon a struggling farmer without his having any previous knowledge of the existence of the charge, and the incident helps to show how many musty relics of feudalism still require sweeping away from our land system.

Although not entertaining an exalted idea of the wisdom and knowledge of the Press, I confess I am astonished at the ignorance of current events revealed in some of the notices which are appearing of "Professor" Garner's book. To the instances already mentioned in Truth may now be added several others, notably a review which appeared in the Globe of October 19, where several of Garner's most impudent fictions respecting his doings in Africa are reproduced, without a hint that the whole story has been impugned on indisputable testimony. In view of these lamentable displays of ignorance, I will take the first opportunity I can find of looking into Garner's precious volume and comparing it with the evidence of other parties as to his African adventures.

Few critics have come in for more criticism than Mr. Clement Scott, and of late he has been belaboured with greater vehemence than usual. That this hard usage has not damaged him very seriously, however, may be judged from the fact that the proprietors of the Daily Telegraph have now made arrangements to retain his services exclusively for that journal. If this arrangement is satisfactory to both parties, it should also be highly satisfactory to the numerous rising lights of dramatic criticism, who will find vacancies thus opened in the profession. The only parties who have cause to be dissatisfied are the various editors who thus find themselves deprived of Mr. Clement Scott's incomparable services.

In reference to the impudent post-card advertisements of a work called "Detrimental Diffusiveness" and another work by the same author, Messrs. H. & C. Treacher, of Brighton, write me that these advertisements have been issued entirely without their sanction, and that they "have obtained an emphatic undertaking that nothing of the sort shall be done again." I trust that this undertaking will be observed; but, from what I hear of him, the author of these works is rather a difficult gentleman to suppress.

There must be an amazing number of obscure individuals yearning to see particulars of their lives in print, judging from the number of people engaged in ministering to this form of vanity. The labours of the Presses, Manning and Truman, are familiar to the readers of Truth, but there is a gentleman named G. R. Hatton, of Fleet, Hants, who is conducting the manufacture of biographies on a scale which throws Manning Press into the shade. Mr. Hatton produces every month a publication called the Biographer, which in each issue puts forth full particulars of the parentage, education, and mode of life of at least ten or a dozen individuals of whom nobody but their next-door neighbour has ever heard. The scale on which Mr. Hatton is now going to work may be judged by the fact that he appears to be making his way steadily through the London Directory from A to Z and inviting every individual whose name he finds there to furnish particulars of his career for the benefit of the Biographer. This I infer from the fact that for two or three weeks past he seems to have been steadily working his way through the letter "B" in the Directory. Three weeks back he was at "Ba," he then got to "Be," and last week he was at "Bo." Mr. Hatton attaches no pecuniary condition to the publication of your biography, in which respect he has an advantage over the two Presses. I take it that he relies for his remuneration upon every client voluntarily giving a large order for copies of the Biographer, and distributing them among his admiring friends. This is, of course, legitimate business, if you can make it pay, but I would advise those who suddenly receive a post-card from Mr. Hatton, inviting them to supply data to the Biographer, not to feel unduly elated at the compliment paid them.

With regard to the remark in last week's Truth on his Preface to "Charlotte Brontë and Her Circle," Mr. Clement Shorter points out that in the same paragraph in which he spoke of the "widespread interest" of Mrs. Gaskell's biography, he admitted that, intrinsically, Boswell's "Life of Johnson," and Lockhart's "Life of Scott," are more important works. His point is that "widespread interest" can only be measured by sales, and that any bookseller can show that Mrs. Gaskell's "Life of Charlotte Brontë" has had a more extensive sale than either of the above-mentioned books, or than Moore's "Byron," or Trevelyan's "Macaulay." On the relative literary merits of these works he disclaims having given any opinion.

A volume of the correspondence of Lord Blachford is to be published this week. Better known as Sir Frederick Rogers, he was for a long time permanent Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, and the intimate friend of many celebrated men, notably Mr. Gladstone, Cardinal Newman, Bishop Wilberforce, and Dean Church. Lord Blachford was an advanced High Churchman, and he took a keen interest in the Oxford movement, and was one of the founders of the Guardian newspaper. Sir Frederick Rogers was raised to the peerage by Mr. Gladstone in 1871, and he died in 1883.

The new buildings of the Sarah Acland Home, at Oxford, will be opened next May by the Prince of Wales. When Sir Henry Acland resigned his office of Regius Professor of Medicine, a large sum was presented to him as a testimonial, and he is devoting the money to the enlargement of the Home which was founded as a memorial of his admirable wife.

Twelve months ago 734 freshmen came into residence at Oxford at the beginning of the University year, but this term there are only 621. This is a serious decline, which has been felt in nearly all the colleges excepting Worcester (where there is a considerable increase) and Christ Church, which has gained eleven, but last year "the House" suffered a heavy fall. Balliol and Magdalen have both fallen, and, in spite of Mr. Gladstone's support of the non-collegiate system, there are eleven fewer of these students than there were a year ago. The most popular colleges at Oxford just now are Keble, Christ Church, New College, and Exeter.

Bishop Temple's translation to Canterbury would seem to have been prompted by the rule of contraries. The late Archbishop was before all things courteous, mild-mannered, and conciliatory; his successor is conspicuously brusque, high-handed, and overbearing. If Lord Salisbury's selection was not prompted by the desire to have an Archbishop as different as possible from the last, the appointment must then be taken as a recognition of Bishop Temple's right-about-face on the Education Question, and his activity in support of the Athelstan Riley movement, and of the abortive Education Bill of last session. Doubtless, the most potent motive was that of putting the Church's most prominent fighting man in the position where he can best render support to the Government in their next legislative effort on behalf of Church Schools.

Whatever qualifications Bishop Temple might have had for the Primacy twelve years ago are now more than counterbalanced by his age. To appoint any man, however hale and vigorous, to an administrative post of such weight and difficulty within a few weeks of his seventy-fifth birthday is undesirable on every ground, and more especially for the bad example thus set to the innumerable prelates and incumbents who are to be seen sticking to their posts for years after their powers have failed. Dr. Temple's abilities as a ruler and organiser are denied by no one, but his work both at Exeter and in London has been marked by conspicuous blunders, and his jobbery has been a scandal. It is to be hoped that he will at any rate not carry with him to Canterbury his free-and-easy ideas as to the use of parochial endowments for lightening the burdens of Bishops without reducing their emoluments.

That the Bishop of Rochester's claims to the Canterbury vacancy should have been passed over will surprise no one in view of his present state of health. But the prelate whose advancement would undoubtedly have been viewed with most approval by clergy and laity is the Bishop of Peterborough, who adds to many of the best qualities of the late Archbishop great force of character, a highly dignified presence, and a considerable reputation as a scholar; while he has twenty years advantage of Dr. Temple in point of age. His appointment to the vacancy at London would be the best and most popular that could be made.

If the new Archbishop were desirous of inaugurating his Primacy with a generous and graceful act, he could not do better than take some steps to secure permanently to the use of the public that portion of the Lambeth Palace Grounds which Archbishop Benson allowed to be used for cricket, donkey shows, and other popular purposes. This piece of ground is of no use to any Archbishop, and would form a public park in a district where such a thing is badly wanted.

The Croydon Advertiser and Surrey County Reporter cannot be congratulated upon some of its references to the death of Archbishop Benson. Could anything be in more execrable taste than the following remark?—

> The death away from Addington has, of course, deprived the neighbourhood of some excitement, and at least one good tradesman in Croydon of an excellent contract and advertisement. I need not specify to what or whom I refer.

Half-a-dozen different statements respecting the profession of Archbishop Benson's father have appeared in the various papers, and not one of them is correct. Mr. Edward White Benson was a consulting and manufacturing chemist, and a man of considerable ability. When the late Primate was born, his father was superintendent of the Stoke Prior Works, near Bromsgrove. Some few years afterwards Mr. Benson removed to Birmingham, having been appointed manager of some large white-lead works, and his son was then sent to the Birmingham Grammar School, of which Dr. Prince Lee (afterwards Bishop of Manchester) was headmaster, and when Bishops Lightfoot and Westcott were pupils there.

Archdeacon Sinclair is to be the Canon-in-Residence and Sunday-afternoon preacher at St. Paul's Cathedral during November, replacing the Suffragan-Bishop of Stepney, who has probably been on duty there for the last time.

According to the Birmingham Post, there is an egregious instance of clerical charity and good feeling at present on view in the parish of St. Luke's, Headless Cross. The curate of this parish so far forgot the dignity of his cloth as to fall in love with and marry the daughter of a farmer in the neighbourhood. He was compelled by the Vicar to resign his appointment, and has been interdicted by the Rector from doing duty. Last Sunday evening there seems to have been a disgraceful scene at the evening service, and the Vicar is reported to have been howled at and hissed on leaving the church. Unless there is a good deal more behind than the public is yet aware of, his reverence seems to have richly deserved this treatment.

The Rector of Little Oakley, Harwich, thinks that if the circumstances were better known, neither I nor any one else would censure the appeals of his little girls to raise money for the rebuilding of the parish church. I have no objection to make the facts better known. Mr. Allen says :—

> When I came to this parish (nearly three years ago) I found the church in an almost ruined condition, and the upper part of the tower had been taken down, as it was considered unsafe. At first it was proposed to restore the old building, but after consideration it was resolved at a parish meeting, as the present church is at the extreme corner of the parish and away from the people, to provide an entirely new one. But this is a small village of poor people. How are we to get £1,600? Though we are doing all we can, it is quite beyond us.

The way this strikes me is that it is a disgraceful thing to a religious community like the Church of England that it should have no common central organisation for preserving the fabrics of its buildings; and that, by reason of this, little village churches should be left to tumble down, unless rectors and vicars are disposed to go cadging all over the country for the means of keeping the walls and roof of the House of God in their places. It is an incidental result of this deplorable state of things that the two little daughters of the Rector of Oakley are sending out their begging-letters. I don't wish to be hard on an incumbent who is so circumstanced, still less on his children. But I should never have heard of these letters if a good many people had not thought that little girls of eight and ten might be better employed than in writing begging-letters, and that view I rather share.

In a printed appeal which he has issued on behalf of the parochial funds, the Vicar of Scarborough remarks that "in this immense parish of 16,000 residents, it is found impossible to carry on the many and varied institutions and associations by means of offertories and subscriptions." I am astonished that the Vicar should have the temerity to place such stress on the size of his parish and the vast amount of work it involves. By doing so this pluralist himself brings out more palpably than ever the scandal of his conduct in leaving his parish to the care of an inadequate staff of curates for month after month each year while he is in residence as a Canon at York or fulfilling his engagements as Suffragan Bishop of Hull.

The Vicar of Stalham, Norfolk, in a recent issue of his parish magazine, wrote about "the gross misrepresentations and exaggerations" which had been published in reference to the condition of the churchyard, and went on to say that additional burying ground would be required "five or six years" hence. There have been no "misrepresentations and exaggerations" in the statements on the subject which have appeared in TRUTH, and the vicar's idea that the existing disgraceful state of things can be allowed to continue for five or six years longer has just been rudely dissipated by one of his ecclesiastical superiors. On Friday last the Archdeacon of Norwich made a careful inspection of the churchyard, with the result that he advised an immediate enlargement, pointing out that unless this were done some other authority might move in the matter. There is now, therefore, a prospect of an end being put to the sickening and disgraceful spectacles which have been witnessed every time a fresh grave has been dug in this overcrowded burial ground.

No one would wish to say a word in disparagement of the Liberator Relief Fund, but the managers can hardly be congratulated on the economical way in which their work has been accomplished. The accounts for 1895, recently issued, show subscriptions during the year to the amount of £13,917, of which £1,888 has gone in administrative expenses. Printing, stationery, postage, and the issue of circulars have cost no less than £1,312, besides which there is an item of £187. 10s. 9d. for "advertising," and £261. 10s. 6d. for "clerical assistance." Of course, advertising and circularising are the chief means to success with a fund of this kind, and the handsome sum already collected shows that these means have not failed in the present case. But 3s. 6d. for advertising and office expenses out of every guinea subscribed is a large order.

I have received the following amounts towards this year's Toy Fund for providing the children in the London Hospitals, Workhouses, Workhouse Schools, and Infirmaries with toys at Christmas :—G. B. Hingston, £1 ; B. S., £1 ; G. P., £5 ; Mrs. E. Phillips, £1. 1s. ; Miss Fleetwood Wilson, £5.

In connection with the War Office treatment of the 4th Hussars scandals, the appointment of Captain the Honourable F. R. W. de Moleyns to the command of the Police Force in Mashonaland and Matabeleland is of considerable interest. Captain de Moleyns was Adjutant of the 4th Hussars at the time of the horse-troughing of Mr. Hodge and the ultimatum delivered to Mr. Bruce. He had been fully informed of the treatment of Mr. Hodge, if he did not know it already, by that unfortunate gentleman's father, and he was also acquainted by Mr. Bruce of what happened at the Nimrod Club within a day or two of that occurrence. He has been succeeded in the Adjutantcy by Mr. Barnes, one of the four gallant horse-troughers of the Hodge incident, and the gentleman in whose name the invitations were sent out to the dinner organised to inform Mr. Bruce that he was not considered a fit person to join the 4th Hussars. So far, therefore, from these incidents having in any way damaged either Captain de Moleyns or Mr. Barnes, it would seem that they have rather tended to advance them in the profession. I hope we shall not hear of the horse-troughing of any Mashonas or Matabele under the De Moleyns regime. There has been quite enough ruffianism in that part of the world already.

The following story from India is full of instruction, both for the public and for Army men. At a large station in the Madras Presidency a soldier was tried a few months ago by a Regimental Court-martial, and was awarded a very light punishment. The C.O. of the Regiment then addressed the following memorandum to the President of the court, having previously expressed himself verbally to the same effect to the two junior members:—

> With regard to the sentence, I consider it a wilful attempt to undermine my authority, and a direct defiance of my orders. It ought to have been clear to any one that this man was sent for trial in order that he should be awarded a heavier punishment than I could give him summarily. It was no question of sifting evidence. The prisoner's guilt was clear.

Note here the frank declaration of this officer's original views on the subject of trial by court-martial. The Regimental Court-martial exists, in his opinion, not for the purpose of administering justice as an independent tribunal, but for the purpose of registering convictions previously passed by the C.O., and awarding a heavier punishment than the C.O. himself is empowered to do by law and military regulations.

This view has actually been endorsed by the General, with what consequences to the three officers composing the court may be imagined. At the request of his colleagues, the President of the court took the opinions of the senior officers on the station as to his duty in the face of this extraordinary reprimand. By their advice he wrote, reminding the C.O. of the oath that the members of the Court had taken, maintaining that they had conscientiously observed it, and requesting that the censure might be withdrawn. The matter then went before the General, who informed the President that his letter to the C.O. was "mere casuistry," and that he entirely agreed with the C.O.'s remarks, at the same time accentuating them by expressing his own opinion that the three members of the Court had violated their oath simply to curry popularity with the men. In the letter in which the General subsequently pronounced his decision, he further accused the President of influencing the junior members of the Court in such a way as to undermine the C.O.'s authority. This expression of opinion, unsustained, of course, by any proof or reason, was the very precise opposite of the facts, the truth being that the unfortunate President had personally been in favour of a very severe punishment. In order to relieve himself of the monstrous imputation thus cast upon him, the President requested his C.O. to call for a statement from each member of the Court of the grounds on which the punishment had been based. This, however, the C.O. refused, retorting on the President with a reference to the oath taken by the members of the Court —the same "casuistry" which the President himself had been rebuked for using — and at this point the matter has dropped.

Few more extraordinary incidents than this have ever been recounted in TRUTH. Here we have three officers, appointed and sworn to duly administer justice, and then treated as offenders themselves, and visited with a double dose of official censure, because their view of the requirements of justice differs from that of their C.O. This censure is meted out blindfold, and without any attempt to discover what part each individual member of the Court has taken in the sentence, and the heaviest measure of blame falls upon the officer who in point of fact was innocent of all responsibility for the sentence. By virtue of the convenient confidential report system, all three of these officers are liable to be permanently damaged in their careers in consequence of the incident; and, so far as I can see, the only chance any of them has of retrieving his reputation and reinstating himself in the good graces of the authorities, is to try and get on to another court-martial, and impose the very heaviest sentence known to the military code, regardless of the nature of the offence, or the prisoner's guilt or innocence. And, after all this, we are sometimes asked to regard courts-martial as tribunals incapable of doing injustice!

It was announced the other day that Major and Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton has been granted a six-months' extension of his appointment as Deputy A.A.G. at Portsmouth, "as compensation for the time lost while absent on active service in Ashanti." "Time lost," it doubtless was in one sense, and money lost, too, but not from the point of view of an officer who has been allowed to count the time as active service and has been rewarded by a decoration from the Queen. Less favoured officers may well resent an extension of Staff Service under such circumstances.

Is there a rule that officers in colonial military employment return to their regimental duties after five years, or resign? If so, why have the War Office broken their rule in the case of Major Moore of the Royal Irish Fusiliers, who has been on special service on the West Coast of Africa since February, 1890? This inquiry is

With reference to the grievance of the 2nd Royal Scots over their clothing, Lieutenant-Colonel Morrison, who commanded the battalion till June, 1895, sends me a letter, from which I give an extract below. If it is really the case that every man who had to pay Rs. 4 9a. in 1895 had received that sum by way of compensation for a deferred issue in 1892, there is an end to the matter. But this account of the affair does not square with the statement to which I gave publicity last week, that, when paying in 1895, the men were told that the money would be refunded in 1896. But I do not wonder that soldiers, or anybody else, should get bewildered over the subtleties of the Indian clothing issues, for I am bound to say it is as much as I can do myself to follow these mysterious complications. This is what Colonel Morrison says:—

The facts are as follows:—On the arrival of the battalion in India from Malta early in 1892 the men were entitled to a new doublet, but as they are little worn I applied for serge frocks in lieu, which application was granted, the men getting compensation for their difference in value then and there. By 1895 many men had outgrown their doublets and some had worn them out. Having reason to believe doublets would be discarded, I put off getting new ones till ordered to do so. Any man who has had to pay R 4. 9 a. in 1895 for difference of value of clothing received this sum in 1892, so is by no means a sufferer by the transaction; while, on the other hand, many a man whose time expired, or was sent home in 1894 and 1895, received in lieu of a doublet (which would have been of no use to him) the sum of R 4. 9 a. and a serge frock, which latter, if this change of issue had not been made, he would have to have paid for out of his own pocket.

As an example of the methods by which the Ordnance Survey Office at Southampton has been managed of late, the following statement is of interest. It has been the practice for some time past of a prominent official to hold about once a week a sort of conference of the men under him for the purpose of lecturing them on their duties, explaining the various orders which have lately fallen in showers upon the Office, instructing the men in their work, and so on. As many as seventy men have been known to be summoned from their work to attend these discourses, and they have been in attendance on an average for about half an hour each time, and this has been going on since February, except during the lecturer's holidays. Hardly the way, one would think, to expedite the business of a large Department.

Here are a few extracts from an anonymous communication addressed to me on the subject of the Ordnance Survey. If this is designed to show that the civilians in the Department are viewed in a friendly and sympathetic spirit by their military superiors, I am sorry to say it fails to carry conviction to me. The reader can judge for himself:—

Ordnance Survey Office, Southampton,
October 23, 1896.

Go it old father of lies! You are doing splendidly. . . . You are a d—— cur to go about slandering the officers of the Survey the way you are doing. Do you know that the man you are trying to make a martyr of had four times as much pay as a sergeant of Engineers? . . . If they are not satisfied with their position why do they not leave? Nobody wants them here. The R.E.s could carry on the work better and more economically without them. But they are naturally a discontented, lazy lot of devils, and since they have come over you, and got you to print their lies in your rag of a paper, they think they are to carry everything before them and clear out the R.E.s . . . Take my advice, and shut up, and leave the officers to manage their own business, which they can very well do without any of your d—— interference. If you don't, you will find yourself in the wrong box presently.—Ordnance Survey.

A pleasant-mannered sort of man to work under! I like, too, his notion of the R.E.s being able to manage any business "better and more economically" than anybody else.

The other day a civilian who had business at the Depot at Dorchester, noticed another individual in civilian garb walking about, and apparently in authority, and on making inquiries found that he was the sergeant-major, who had been disporting himself in mufti since about ten o'clock in the morning. The civilian writes to ask me whether this is the usual practice at Depots. I know so little about these matters that I can only refer my correspondent to the C.O., or perhaps to the editor of one of the Service journals.

A notice was, I understand, published in Camp Orders at Kilworth, that, on the camp breaking up, the credit balance would be divided among the members of the mess. Whether any attempt has been made to carry this out, I do not know, but in one battalion at least the sergeants who were at Kilworth have not received a halfpenny. The mess subscription at Kilworth was sixpence a day, and the sergeants got little more than their ordinary rations; so it would seem that there ought to be something substantial to divide. Who is responsible for this state of affairs?

I am pleased to have received from the Depot of the Essex Regiment an authoritative reply to various remarks upon that establishment that have appeared in Truth during the last two or three weeks. But with all respect, I cannot say that the reply disposes of all the points raised. In regard to the statement as to the sergeant-major and quartermaster-sergeant having passed practically the whole of their Army life at the Depot, I am now told that they are both in the prime of life and excellent officers. I have not questioned that; but it seems to me—speaking with humility, as an outsider—that a man who has put in the whole of his service at a Depot must have had a very limited and one-sided Army training, and that it is desirable to have at Depots men who have done a full share of regimental service. It is denied that these two men do not always get on well with N.C.O.s from the Line battalions; but I must say that I think I have some evidence to the contrary.

Again, with regard to there being no lance-corporals at the Depot, the answer is that the C.O. can have an establishment of either 40 privates, or 28 privates and 12 lance-corporals, and that with the approval of the General he finds it best to have 40 privates. The question remains, however, whether the privates find it best. I originally put the case from the point of view of the privates, who have to do lance-corporals' work in addition to their own,

W. & F. Thorn's Speciality.—Job Carriages.—This is by far the best and cheapest way to keep an establishment, saving all trouble, annoyance, and expense. Carriages kept like new for small annual payments.—10, Gt. Portland Street, W. Ranelagh House, Lower Grosvenor-place, S.W. London only.

and get no extra pay for it. The C.O. and the General may think this the best of all possible arrangements, but I cannot quite admit that this settles the matter. The statement, on the other hand, as to TRUTH being mutilated, seems to have been an exaggeration, as I am assured that this only happened once, and that it was then at once reported by the librarian, and a new copy provided. There remains only one other point—the allegation as to a married private being turned out of his quarters to make way for the cook of the officers' mess. It is denied that such a thing has happened, and I place the denial on record; but, as my information was very precise, it is necessary to make some further inquiry.

I pilloried last week a grievance of the corporals of the Army Pay Corps at Woolwich, who complain that they are denied the privilege of wearing sergeants' stripes, which is allowed to men of the same rank in the corps at other stations. Apparently the grievance only extends to the juniors, and I hear that the privilege has been promised to the rest on their completing two years' service as corporal. It seems, however, that there is another side to the question, for no sooner had my remarks gone to press, than I came across a growl from a corporal in another departmental corps at Portsmouth, complaining that the A. P. C. corporals there should be allowed to wear stripes and otherwise enjoy the privileges of sergeants. I have an idea that the A. P. C. corporals are not the only men in the Service who are allowed to wear stripes and belong to a sergeants' mess, but it is pretty clear that there ought to be some general rule throughout the Service, for whether the privilege is allowed at one station or in one corps only, it is bound to create jealousy and discontent among other corporals who are not equally favoured. If the system works well, or is considered desirable in one case, it must be equally so in all.

Although Mr. Charles Dibdin has not seen fit to favour me with any communication on the subject of the behaviour of the crew of the Kingstown lifeboat on a recent occasion, I am glad to see that an explanation has been given on behalf of the crew in the Dublin papers. The point of the explanation is that the crew really did go up to the wreck on the occasion of their first expedition, and not seeing any one on board, and not getting any reply to their shouts, they put back again. As this is corroborated by the two men who actually were on the wreck, and who state that they were prevented by the high sea then running from leaving the cabin, where they were at the time when they heard the lifeboat men hail them, it seems to absolve the crew from any suspicion of having failed in their duty.

Before Admiral Field, M.P., and other Justices at Gosport Police-court last week, a writer employed in the Gun Wharf, named J. P. R. Morris, was charged with assaulting his wife and bound over to keep the peace. The evidence showed that the defendant, who had been drinking, caught his wife by the throat and tried to strangle her and also threatened to cut her throat and to gouge her eyes out. "A nice man for a writer, no mistake," observed Admiral Field. "Such a man ought not to be in Government employ. I have only to raise my little finger and he would be turned out." As, however, the Admiral did not raise his finger, I venture to raise mine. I would suggest to his superiors that this drunken reprobate is anything but a credit to the Service, and that unless he mends his ways the Service would be well rid of him.

To make the fact that a man's long and faithful services have entitled him to the maximum pay for his work a reason for dismissing him is, indeed, hard lines; but, according to a memorial that has been addressed to Lord George Hamilton, this is the practice pursued with regard to the humbler employees on the Indian North-Western State Railway. The memorial is on behalf of one Sharkey, late an engine-driver on this line, who, after nearly sixteen years' service, has been discharged on the ground that, a reduction of the staff being necessary, the head of his department desired to retain "cheaper and younger hands instead of the older on maximum pay." I fear it is hopeless to expect the Secretary of State to interfere for the redress of the grievance of this particular individual, but the injustice of the policy described might, at any rate, be pointed out to the management of this State Railway. How would the system be relished, I wonder, in the higher branches of the railway service?

Concerning the objection of certain tribes in the Thana district of the Bombay Presidency to the abolition of the privilege of collecting dead wood in the Government forests, a late Revenue officer writes me that "it is only fair to the forest officers to say that this has not been done until the time was fully ripe for it, nor without the advice of Revenue officers whose function in relation to forests in the Bombay Presidency is to see that human interests are not subordinated to those of vegetables, of whatever size and value." He goes on to state that the tribes have greatly improved in condition during the past ten or twelve years, and that the abolition of this privilege will be for their benefit. It may be so, but the paragraph I quoted from the Deccan Herald last week shows that the tribesmen themselves unfortunately do not see it in that light.

Very gloomy private accounts have reached me of the failure of the food crops in the North-Western Provinces and a large area of Central India, and a scarcity such as has not been experienced for the last seventeen or eighteen years seems inevitable. Judging, however, from what has appeared in the daily papers, the Indian Government are confident of their ability to avert such frightful consequences as marked the famine of 1877-8, and the vast development of artificial irrigation and railway communication since that time is a decidedly reassuring feature in the situation. One can only trust that the confidence which is expressed in the present means of coping with such a difficulty will be justified by events; and meanwhile the following extracts from one of the letters I have received—written by an English lady—may be profitably pondered by everybody interested in the condition of our Indian fellow-subjects:—

Now, we are not responsible for the bad seasons, but we are responsible for the enormous taxes—for the 4,000 per cent. on salt, and for the heavy taxes on every article of food and clothing, whereby we habitually keep the poorer classes of India at the level of the barest subsistence. Thousands upon thousands of them never get more than one scanty meal per day. . . . . We have been reproached with our famines. It has been said that famine marks our rule—and justly, for though we cannot help the failure of the crops, we can help the state of the people, and we can stop export in time. But what are we doing? We have "ceased to augment" the Famine Insurance Fund—that is the Parliamentary phrase for borrowing from that "sacred trust" to pay for Chitral—so making food pay for powder! We confessed to actually borrowing from that Fund, but it has been represented that the borrowed sums have been partly repaid. But how about the "non-augmentation?" And how about export? If in the spring Giant Famine leaps upon us, every ear of wheat exported will appear to be what it is—the life of a man. . . . . Our taxes have so sapped the very life of the people that they have no reserves of any kind against the evil day—no reserves of money, and, what is worse, no reserves of physical vitality. They can but just keep themselves alive at the best. When famine comes they perish with a frightful promptitude—as did the Irish from the selfsame cause in 1847. It is for this reason that any refusal or delay on our part to face the reality of the danger is so criminal.

A clerk of the second division, higher grade, employed in the P.O. Savings Bank Department is threatened with compulsory retirement under somewhat peculiar circumstances. Entering the Department in 1870, as a boy clerk, he was promoted step by step to the second class. For twenty-three years without a break he received an annual increment of pay, but it was stopped in 1894, and none has since been granted to him. The reason assigned for the stoppage was that he was incapable of controlling subordinates; but from the persistency and severity with which he has been criticised and harassed, and shifted from duty to duty, it looks as though there was a deliberate desire to get rid of him. It seems that if a man's increments are withheld on the recommendation of his superiors for three years, the Treasury then inquire why his services should any longer be retained. That course has been adopted in this instance, with the result that the clerk in question is likely to be shortly superannuated, though he is not yet forty-three years of age.

Far be it from me to contend that increments should be automatically granted to a Civil servant year after year without regard to his merits or competence, or that he should be retained on full salary when he is proved to have become inefficient (though, to be sure, this is what not unfrequently happens). There appear to be good grounds for thinking, however, that the clerk concerned in this case has not had fair and considerate treatment. In the first place, nothing beyond the vague complaint on the original stoppage of his increment has been brought against him, and in regard to that he was condemned unheard, while subsequently everything possible was done to prevent him earning a good report. Assuming, as one is bound to do, that he deserved promotion to his present grade, it is, to say the least, singular that his alleged inefficiency should only have been discovered after he had served several years and received several increments in that grade. But even if it be granted that he is not worthy of any further advance of salary, why should the extreme step of pensioning him off be taken? Although it is the practice of the Treasury to make the inquiry referred to above—a practice which apparently places every member of the staff completely at the mercy of the chief—it by no means follows that a man is sent about his business when his promotion is checked. It would be absurd, indeed, if it were so, and there are several examples to the contrary in the same Department. Finally, if there is no prospect of this clerk serving satisfactorily in his present position, the regulations permit his transfer to some other Department, where he might possibly have a fairer chance. Why is he not given this chance?

There is, furthermore, a legal aspect of the case which requires attention. It is understood that if this clerk is retired it will be under Clause 2 of the Superannuation Act of 1887, which empowers the grant of a retiring allowance to Civil servants who are removed from office for inefficiency. But, he comes under the Act of 1859, which provides that no allowance shall be granted to a person under sixty years of age, except upon a medical certificate of mental or bodily infirmity, and Clause 10 of the Act of 1887 expressly declares that that Act shall not in any way interfere with the existing interests of any Civil servant then holding office. In view of this reservation, it is difficult to see how the latter Act can be applied to this case.

How is a householder, when he shuts up his house and goes away from town, to communicate with the party left in charge? The action of the Post Office in such cases has rendered this a serious question. In last week's TRUTH reference was made to the case of a distinguished Duke, who sent a letter to the caretaker of his London house, which the Post Office simply returned undelivered and unopened. Two or three other cases of the same kind have now come to light. One of them recently occurred in the case of a letter addressed to a house in Cumberland. From an official communication in relation to this case, I gather that the Post Office only re-directs letters where a house is empty, and that consequently if a notice for re-direction of letters is given, that house is assumed to be empty until the notice is cancelled. If, therefore, any person goes to reside there in the interval, he (or she) can receive no letters, all communications addressed to the house being re-directed and forwarded in accordance with the re-direction notice. Some modification of this regulation seems desirable in the interests of common-sense and public convenience.

Apropos of the recent appointments to the Irish Board of Works, I am reminded that, whereas fifteen years ago the Board was an exclusively professional one, there is now no member of it with any technical knowledge, except in the matter of railway management. At the time mentioned, the Chairman was a Colonel R.E., with two civil engineers for colleagues; now you have a railway manager, a barrister, and a Treasury clerk. It is quite in accordance with official traditions in such matters that, while the Board has thus deteriorated as regards the technical qualifications of its members, the salary of the Chairman has "appreciated" from £1,500 to £2,500 a year.

Apparently, as a set off to this uncalled-for increase of expenditure at the top of the tree, the travelling allowances to surveyors and inspectors under the Board have been reduced from first to second class fares, and their maintenance allowance from 5s. to 3s. 6d. per diem. Give the head of the department another £1,000 a year, and knock 5 per cent. off all the men drawing less than £150. That seems to be the only principle of economy understood at present in any public office — civil or military.

A gentleman living at Chelsea tells me that hope revived in his breast on seeing the paragraph in TRUTH a fortnight ago in reference to the Thames steamboat service. He begs me not to drop this subject until something has been done to give London a really comfortable and efficient steamboat service. Gladly would I do anything in my power in this direction. We have one of the finest rivers of any city in the world, and probably nowhere else in the world is there such an enormous population ready to avail itself of a properly-organised system of river traffic as can be found between, say, Hammersmith and Woolwich. On both sides of the river thousands of people travel to and from the City every day by crawling trams and omnibuses, or unsavoury underground railways, who would infinitely prefer to travel by river if the steamboats met their requirements equally well. How is it that no practical attempt has ever been made to bring this line of communication into use?

I am told that, in great part, the fault lies with the heavy dues to which steamboat companies are subjected. In other words, the Thames Conservancy has killed the goose for the sake of the golden eggs. There may be something in this, but not everything. There has never yet been on the Thames—I mean, of course, above bridges—a fleet of swift, comfortable, and punctual steamers, and until an attempt has been made to run such a line, and has been attended with failure, I, for one, shall refuse to believe that such an enterprise is foredoomed to failure from the heavy dues imposed by the Thames Conservancy. What is first wanted, I take it, to ensure success is that a passenger should be able to get from Hammersmith to Westminster, or from Chelsea to the City, at least as quickly as by omnibus, and that he shall be able to rely on doing so at stated times in the morning and evening. If he could do this, and were offered, in addition, a comfortable seat in the open air in fine weather, under cover in wet, and in a well-warmed saloon in winter, with an opportunity also, perhaps, of getting his breakfast or his tea en route, I believe that he would, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, prefer a steamboat to any other means of conveyance, and that a company providing these attractions could quickly obtain a sufficient number of season-ticket holders to ensure the enterprise against failure.

Every requirement for Furnishing tastefully at least expense is amply illustrated in the Galleries and Catalogues of HAMPTON & SONS, Furnishers & Decorators, Pall Mall East, S.W.

Up to the present time the ordinary Thames steam boat has been a reproach to our civilisation, worse even than the London growler. It has undergone scarcely any change in the way of improvement since the time when steamboats were first invented. It has been uniformly dirty, ugly, ill-found, slow, uncomfortable, unpunctual, and everything bad. Let any enterprising company with sufficient capital at its back, and sufficient intelligence at head-quarters to meet the requirements of the public, embark in an enterprise of this kind on the lines of the steamboat services in Paris, or on some of the American rivers, and I prophesy that it will be able to pay respectable dividends to its shareholders, as well as its fair contribution to the public expenses of river management, in the shape of Conservancy dues.

It is curious to watch the infatuation of the wire-pullers who are actively directing the present cab-drivers' agitation. They must long since have recognised that the sympathies of the public are not with them, and that they are fighting a losing game; but, most extraordinary of all, they appear to be utterly careless of the fact that in less than three weeks' time an opposition will be possible which may completely revolutionise the whole trade. And not only possible, but remarkably probable, if, as it is confidently asserted, the London Electric Omnibus Company are only waiting for November 14 next—the date at which the new Act for motor vehicles comes into force—to commence active operations.

To supplement a note I published the other week, a ratepayer at Sheerness thinks it should in fairness be mentioned that the breakdown of the water supply in that town has been in a large measure due to the efforts of the Council to supply the dockyard authorities with water when the latter's own well was under repair, the consequent extra strain upon the municipal spring having caused the "blow" of sand which resulted in the choking of the pumps. It is, however, but cold comfort to the domestic consumer, whether he is a private individual or a Government official, to know that the origin of the trouble was a desire to assist the dockyard authorities; nor do I see how this exculpates the municipal authorities from the criticism they have received for failing to keep their old well in working order and for dilly-dallying with the difficulty when it first arose. My correspondent seems, indeed, to appreciate this, for he expresses the hope that the "rub" I gave the Council will do them good.

Here is cause for a legitimate agitation, which I shall only be too glad to forward to the best of my power. The Abney Park Cemetery Company are proposing to acquire forty acres of land in close proximity to Hampstead Heath. Now Hampstead has come to be recognised as one of the playgrounds of London, and—in the eternal fitness of things—it would be out of place to tone down its mirth by the addition of a burial ground; equally it might be expected to jar on the feelings of the mourners were they compelled to carry out the last sad offices to the accompaniment of a Bank-holiday celebration. In addition to which, there is a saddening influence inseparable from these huge graveyards which every one should do his best to remove from "'Appy 'Ampstead"—unless, indeed, there is a conspiracy to reverse this exuberant title. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the agitation against this project will be unanimous and powerful.

At the last meeting of the Knaresborough Guardians much gratification was expressed at the fact that the cost of maintaining the paupers in the workhouse had been reduced from £6·7 per head in 1891 to £3·7 per head in 1896, or, in other figures, from 4d. and $\frac{7}{10}$ths of a farthing to 2d. and $\frac{8}{10}$ths of a farthing per day for each person. I can well understand the pride and delight with which Bumbles of an economical turn of mind contemplate these proofs of their cheese-paring capacity. But what about the paupers? I should much like to hear how they fare on twopence and eight-tenths of a farthing per day; also whether it is proposed to continue the cutting down of expenses until they come to live, like chameleons, on air.

The Local Government Board have at length made an impression, though only a very faint one, on the minds of that dense and self-willed body the Helmsley Rural District Council. One of the numerous questions on which the Council has been setting the Board at defiance is in regard to the salary of the inspector of nuisances, the Council declining to pay more than £20 a year, and the Board expressing the opinion that this amount should be more than doubled. The last letter from Whitehall was couched in such peremptory terms that Lord Feversham was constrained to advise the Council over which he presides "to meet the Board in some way if they could." The Council did not relish the idea, but, after many lamentations, they resolved to increase the salary to £25 a year, which still leaves it at an amount utterly inadequate for the proper inspection of the widely-scattered country district over which the officer's duties extend. Having grudgingly made this paltry concession in the matter of the salary, the Council seem to have thought they could safely put aside other and more vital questions of sanitary administration, but whether the Local Government Board will be so easily appeased remains to be seen.

The residents of Goff's Oak, near Cheshunt, have been considerably disturbed by the establishment of a private fever hospital in the middle of the village. A schoolmaster at Waltham Cross has, it seems, taken a cottage at Goff's Oak, which he intends to use for the isolation of any cases of infectious disease which may occur in his school, and the first patient he sent there was a pupil suffering from scarlet fever. It is only natural that the inhabitants should object to this importation of disease into the village, but it appears that the District Council, whom they memorialised on the question, have no power to interfere, and I do not suppose that the Local Government Board or any other authority can help them. Apparently the only course open to them is to appeal to the good sense and feeling of the schoolmaster, who might surely just as easily select some isolated house for his purpose as one in the middle of the village.

Some strange disclosures have been made at an inquest on the body of a female patient at the Norfolk County Asylum at Thorpe. The woman had been an inmate of the institution for more than four years, and she died two days after she had been delivered of a still-born child. Dr. Thomson, the medical superintendent notified the death (as he was bound by law to do) to the coroner, but when in due course that functionary and the jury assembled, it was found that the body had been removed to the woman's home fifteen miles away, and that even after the coroner's notice of his intention to hold an inquest had been received at the Asylum, a certificate for the burial had been sent to the deceased's parents. The superintendent's explanation was that he thought it a case in which an inquest would prove unnecessary, and that the certificate was despatched in "the usual course of business." But these proceedings, as the coroner hinted, certainly gave colour to the idea that there was a desire to get the body buried out of the way.

It also transpired that Dr. Thomson, without waiting for the consent of the relatives or the instructions of the coroner, had himself made a post-mortem examination of the body before its removal from the asylum. In the circumstances the jury very properly demanded a further examination by an independent medical man; and in consequence the further fact was elicited that the deceased woman's heart and womb had been despatched by Dr. Thomson to a professor at Edinburgh University. These organs were returned, and as the result of the independent examination which was made the jury found that the woman's death was due to exhaustion occasioned by mania and childbirth, adding a strong censure of the manner in which the body had been dealt with, and of the reluctance which had been shown in giving information. This verdict is satisfactory as far as it goes, but there is one most important aspect of the scandal which it leaves untouched. Not a word is said as to the disgraceful circumstance of this poor lunatic's condition—in fact, the coroner and jury seem throughout the inquiry to have entirely overlooked the point. It is to be hoped, however, that it will not escape the attention of the Lunacy Commissioners. I should think, indeed, that the revelations just made, combined with those at an inquest a few months back, will convince the Commissioners of the desirability of holding a thorough inquiry into the general management of the Thorpe Asylum.

What with the anomalies of "Crowner's quest law" and the vagaries in which coroners and their juries occasionally indulge, I do not wonder that people sometimes have misgivings as to the utility of many of the inquests that are held. Such misgivings have been awakened in the mind of a Dorsetshire correspondent by a study of the reports of various local inquiries, the conclusion to which he comes being that juries in his part of the country are so self-opinionated that they prefer to guess for themselves at the cause of a sudden and mysterious death without calling for any expert opinion whatever; while, if medical evidence does happen to be tendered, they think nothing of brushing it aside in favour of some wild and ignorant theory of their own. One of the cases my correspondent mentions is that of a recent inquest at Shipton Gorge concerning the death of a farmer's daughter. The doctor who had attended her, said that death was probably due to disease of the heart, whereupon the jury, by some occult process of reasoning, at once arrived at a verdict of "Death from natural causes—probably perforation of the stomach." With a jury of the mental calibre of these beef-witted bumpkins the holding of an inquest is indeed nothing better than a legal farce.

On the other hand, it must be admitted that the Coroner's Court often serves a useful purpose, particularly in the ventilation of public scandals. There was an instance at an inquest at Belfast the other day, when an incidental reference to the accommodation for prisoners at the police station gave the coroner an opportunity of calling attention to an official report on the subject which has long been before the City Council. Here are some passages from this document:—

> There are only twelve cells, arranged in three tiers, and the upper tier is used only as store-rooms. More than a hundred prisoners are often shut up in these cells. The air is indescribably foul. The cells are dirty, and we saw vermin crawling up the walls. An open grating is the only means by which air and light can enter. The heating apparatus is useless, and neither pillow nor rug is provided for the prisoners. What the condition of the unfortunate creatures must be confined in winter weather in unheated cells, open to the air, without covering, may be imagined, but cannot easily be described. Each cell contains a closet, in a hopeless condition of dirt and decay. These closets are only flushed once a day, when the prisoners leave the cells. The large cell contained, when we visited it, no less than sixteen prisoners, huddled together, without light or heat, without a seat of any description, and breathing air of a character that baffles description. Not one of the cells was properly washed. The drainage is as bad as bad can be. The soil-pipe leading from the upper cells is broken. The fall is so bad that the drain-pipes are unable to carry their contents away. Under these circumstances, it is not surprising to know that the place is swarming with rats.

It seems almost incredible that such a state of things can exist in a civilised city, and especially in the city of Belfast, which is always so loud in its protestations of superiority to mere Irish towns like Dublin and Cork. But according to the coroner, the above scathing exposure and condemnation of the police cells was embodied in a report of a committee of the Corporation twelve months ago, and up to the present "nothing but talk has been done." Perhaps the City Fathers of Belfast are hoping to kill off the criminal population by cold and disease.

The fishermen of Gourdon are up in arms against a new scale of harbour dues which it is sought to exact from them on behalf of Mr. Farquhar, the "superior" of this Kincardineshire village. It appears that the laird's claim is made under an Act of Parliament passed over fifty years ago, and long fallen into desuetude. While willing to pay reasonable charges, the fishermen contend that those now imposed are altogether excessive in view of what is paid elsewhere and the inferiority of the harbour accommodation at Gourdon. The legal right of the proprietor to levy the dues has been affirmed in the Sheriff Court, but the fishermen have adopted a scheme of voluntary taxation among themselves in order to raise a fund for fighting the matter out in the Court of Session, and, if necessary, carrying the appeal to the House of Lords, which has decided against the harbour proprietors in more than one similar case. The dispute, however it may end, affords a fresh proof of the anomaly and undesirability of leaving the control of such harbours as that at Gourdon in the hands of a private proprietor.

One of the usual edifying public inquiries into a child's knowledge of the nature of an oath was conducted by Mr. Littler, Q.C., on Saturday. This is what transpired:—

> Mr. Littler: Do you understand the meaning of an oath?—Yes.
> Tell me what taking an oath means.—To tell the truth.
> Do you know whether anything happens here or hereafter to those who have taken the oath and say that which is false?—Yes.
> What does happen?—No answer was made to this, and Mr. Littler said he was of opinion that the girl did not understand, and therefore could not be sworn.

As the little girl could not answer the question, I would suggest that Mr. Littler himself should tell us what happens to people under these circumstances. Had I been in the little girl's place I should have said that so far as "here" is concerned, nothing ever happens to them, so far as I have seen; while, as to "hereafter," if the Chairman of the Middlesex Sessions can say for certain what will happen, I wish he would let me know.

To prove how little happens here below to those who commit perjury, I would call as a witness Colonel Howard of the Stratford Bench. In connection with a case before him last week, Colonel Howard remarked that for six months he had been observing with astonishment the perjury which, he was perfectly convinced, was going on in that court, and he went on to warn all witnesses who appeared in the court that he was waiting for an opportunity to commit some one for perjury. "If necessary," he added, "he would pay the expenses himself." The gallant Colonel's sentiments do him honour, but I would advise him to think twice before throwing away his money on any such Quixotic enterprise. I was once led to undertake a prosecution for perjury, and I had to pay the expenses myself—up to the point when the Public Prosecutor relieved me of the costs—but nobody else but myself suffered, although it was a case in which the verdict of a previous jury was equivalent to a finding that perjury had been committed. The present law on the subject of perjury is nothing but a protection to perjurers, and that is the reason why the offence is so freely committed, and always with impunity. I am afraid that, as to what will happen hereafter, the majority of perjurers are in the same state of mind as Mr. Littler's little girl—they either don't know or don't care.

On September 24, I commented in strong terms upon the conduct of the Newcastle-on-Tyne Bench in heavily fining the landlord of the Cumberland Arms, and endorsing his licence for supplying drink to a drunken man, notwithstanding the fact that all the witnesses for the prosecution, as well as those for the defence, positively swore that at the time he was served the man in question was sober. The publican appealed to Quarter Sessions last week, and, as I anticipated, the Recorder at once quashed the conviction with costs against the magistrates, adding that "There was no evidence whatever that the man was drunk when he was in the public-house." A more flagrant and apparently wilful miscarriage of justice has rarely been perpetrated, and the names of the woodenheads responsible for it ought to be forthwith removed from the Commission of the Peace.

In the administration of the law at Kidderminster it seems to be thought that a warrant is a legal instrument for the arrest of somebody, but that who that somebody may be is quite immaterial. If an information is sworn against A, B's name may be afterwards substituted for A's in the warrant, and finally C may find himself taken into custody in virtue of the same document. This appears to have been done in a case which came up at Worcestershire Quarter Sessions last week, and I am pleased to notice that the Chairman, Mr. Willis Bund, did not mince his words in the lecture he addressed to the magistrates' clerk on this illegal and outrageous proceeding. Were he on a jury in a case where such a course was pursued the Chairman would, he said, give damages in four figures. The aggrieved party will, indeed, be foolish if he does not take this hint, and bring an action for unlawful arrest.

About a year back (November 21, 1895) some comment appeared in TRUTH on an action brought by a dairyman against the Rev. G. H. Tovey for goods supplied to his wife and family during his absence in America. The action was tried in Bournemouth County Court, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, against which there was an appeal to the High Court. This appeal resulted in a new trial being ordered by the Divisional Court, and the new trial, which by special order of the Court took place in Westminster County Court, ended last week in a verdict for Mr. Tovey, the defendant. In view of the remarks made in TRUTH at the time, it seems only due to Mr. Tovey to state that the final result of the proceedings is to show that his conduct throughout the business has been of the most honourable kind, that he has been struggling for years past under great disadvantage to do his duty to his creditors and to his wife and family; and that his wife had incurred fresh debts, notwithstanding his repeated injunctions against the pledging of his credit. The parties, to my mind, who come worst out of the business are the Bournemouth jury who—misled apparently by trade prejudice—gave so unjust a verdict in the first instance.

Sheriff Grahame, of Perth, seems to allow a good deal of latitude to the peculiar humour of intoxicated natives of those parts. The other week a German visitor was taking a run on his bicycle between Perth and Crieff when he was stopped by two men who produced knives, demanded money, and terrified him into handing them 3s. 6d. It was stated that the men were under the influence of liquor at the time, and thereupon the Sheriff treated the affair as "a drunken frolic," and found the charge of robbery not proven. I do not know whether the worthy Sheriff is himself a cyclist, but if he is and two men chance some day to serve him as this foreigner was served, will he take an equally light view of the matter? I rather fancy such a personal experience would modify his views with regard to drunken frolics.

Sir Arthur C. Stepney, Bart., has written an extraordinary letter to the Home Secretary complaining of the reign of lawlessness in Llanelly, and impugning the administration of justice by the local magistrates. He advocates the appointment of a stipendiary magistrate, and if he had confined himself to this point he would have had my sympathy, for that is a step which in my opinion would be vastly to the advantage of every town in the country. But Sir Arthur goes on to make a fierce and sweeping attack upon the character of Llanelly. According to his account "life, limb, and property are endangered," and the town presents "a state of affairs strange and seldom seen in civilised countries." This alarming communication was referred by the Home Secretary to the Carmarthenshire Joint Standing Committee; and at a meeting of that body last week the Superintendent of Police at Llanelly presented a report dealing in detail with the statements made by Sir Arthur in support of his allegation. The report, confirmed by the testimony of several prominent citizens of Llanelly, proved to demonstration that the state of things pictured by Sir Arthur Stepney has no existence whatever outside his own excited imagination; and the Committee adopted a strong resolution expressing surprise and indignation at his charges.

It is not at all astonishing to learn that this attempt to defame the town is keenly resented by the inhabitants. So far from Llanelly being given over to violence and criminality, the exact contrary is the fact. Statistics show, indeed, that no industrial centre in the kingdom is more free from the stain of crime; and as the Committee suggest in their resolution of protest, the breaking of a few street lamps, and damage done to an empty house, for which Sir Arthur Stepney or his agent neglected to provide a caretaker, are utterly insufficient grounds for his monstrous indictment of a whole community. The strange thing is that Sir Arthur should have been so ill-advised as to indulge in this bitter diatribe against a town of which he has so little personal knowledge. It is true that he has ample proof of the industry of Llanelly, for it has swollen his rent-roll in the neighbourhood to something like £35,000 a year. But he is an absentee landlord, spending much of his time in roaming to far ends of the earth, and, as a correspondent remarks, is doubtless better qualified to speak of the condition of Kamschatka or Timbuctoo than of the town from which he derives his income.

Rarely has my Legal Pillory contained more striking illustrations of judicial ineptitude in fitting the punishment to the crime than those which I give this week from various Courts of Quarter Sessions. The palm must be awarded, I think, to the Recorder of Cork, whose sentence on the woman O'Neill, in particular, shows such unbridled ferocity that I trust it will be at once brought to the notice of the Lord Lieutenant for revision. Apparently Mr. Neligan, Q.C., considers that because this poor old woman of eighty has spent a great part of her life in gaol it is his duty to see that she dies there; though if the truth as to her history were made known it would probably be found that she has been more sinned against than sinning. There are two other noteworthy items from Ireland—the monstrously harsh treatment of some lads for pilfering from an automatic machine at Dublin, and the equally monstrous lenity of the Bench in a case of cruelty at Mallow. I would also call attention to the penalties imposed on a labourer and a doctor respectively for similar offences at East Penwith, and I should like the Luton Bench to explain how, except by a contemptible quibble, they can justify the conviction of a man in receipt of a military pension for being without visible means of subsistence:—

Cork Quarter Sessions. Before the Recorder, Mr. J. C. Neligan, Q.C. Jeremiah Collins, convicted of assaulting his wife. He went home drunk, knocked his wife down, kicked her, and broke her arm. This was the prisoner's fourteenth conviction. Twelve months.

Robert Brady, convicted of wounding James Hegarty. Prisoner stabbed Hegarty in the region of the heart, puncturing his left lung. One month.

John Brady pleaded guilty to assaulting his wife. The woman's skull was fractured in two places. Bound over.

Portsmouth Quarter Sessions. Before the Recorder, Mr. G. D. Warry, Q.C. Henry Herbert Moorse, convicted of maliciously wounding his wife. The medical evidence showed that besides cuts and bruises she had two of her ribs broken. Three months.

West Kirrier Petty Sessions, Helston. John Faull and his wife, charged with assaulting John Perry, aged 72. The male defendant, who has lost his left hand, struck complainant on the head with the iron ring which was screwed to the stump of his arm, knocking him down and cutting his head, which bled profusely. He then knelt on complainant's chest and beat him about the body with the ring, while the woman tore out his whiskers and gave him a black eye. The assault was entirely unprovoked. Faull fined 10s. and costs, and his wife 5s. and costs.

Somerset Quarter Sessions. Albert Whitlock, convicted of indecently assaulting a girl aged eleven. Six weeks.

Cork Quarter Sessions. Before the Recorder. Annie O'Neill, a woman, 80 years of age, pleaded guilty to stealing a pair of trousers from a shop. The Recorder said she had spent forty years in gaol. Three years' penal servitude.

Ellen Flynn pleaded guilty to stealing a shawl. There were five previous convictions. Three years' penal servitude.

Patrick Callaghan, convicted of stealing a basket containing five dozen eggs. Three years' penal servitude.

Portsmouth Quarter Sessions. Before the Recorder. Mary Ann Stevens, charwoman, convicted of stealing a sheet, value 1s., and a brush, value 1s. 6d. There were previous convictions, including two sentences of penal servitude by the same Recorder. Three years.

Luton Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor (Alderman Bird) and Mr. J. Higgins. William Ivory, an Army pensioner, charged with sleeping out and being without visible means of subsistence. Seven days.

Condover Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. M. Hulton-Harrop, J. P. Smith, and T. Corbett. John Jones, charged with sleeping out. Seven days.

Somerset Quarter Sessions. Joseph Ball, convicted of wandering about without visible means of subsistence. Six months.

Old Spiced Elderberry Wine prevents chills; delicious winter beverage. 15/- per doz. reputed quarts. Carriage paid. Cash with order.—Carter & Co., Old Refinery, Bristol.

Northamptonshire Quarter Sessions. Before Mr. S. G. Stopford Sackville and other magistrates. Charles Henry Peacock and John Henry Betts, policemen, convicted of wilfully inflicting bodily harm upon Harry Bevan, a navvy, at Brackley. The constables found Bevan sleeping out near a watchman's fire on the new railway works, and beat and kicked him in the most brutal way, inflicting injuries which for a time placed his life in danger. Peacock three months, Betts four months.

Pollokshaws Police-court. Before Bailie Leishman. Hugh M'Manus pleaded guilty to assaulting Elizabeth M'Gill. He met her in the street and, without any provocation threw her down, struck her in the face, and kicked her on the body and legs. He afterwards went to her house and struck her violently on the face and body, rendering her unconscious. The girl had previously refused to keep company with him. Fined £2.

Mallow Petty Sessions. Before Mr. R. E. Longfield and other magistrates. Patrick Mahony and his wife, charged with ill-treating and neglecting a child, the daughter of the man and stepdaughter of the woman. The child had been very badly used by both defendants, and the woman, besides severely beating her, had put her hand in the girl's mouth and torn the inside of her cheeks with her nails. The case against the male defendant was adjourned, and the woman was fined 1s. and 15s. costs.

Northamptonshire Quarter Sessions. Before the same Bench. William Blunt, a poor, shivering old man, charged with vagrancy, after previous convictions. Four months.

Richard Egan, aged 63, pleaded guilty to night poaching. Ten months.

North Holland Quarter Sessions. Before Col. Moore. Reuben Garwell, charged with stealing a duck. Twelve months.

Clitheroe County Police-court. Before Col. Starkie, Col. Turner, Major Parker, and Mr. H. H. Stuttard. John Westall, James Mason, Thomas Thomas, John Brierley, and John Sharples summoned for poaching. They chased a hare, but did not catch it. Brierley fined £1 and costs, Thomas and Mason £2 each and costs, Westall and Sharples £5 each and costs.

Dublin Southern Division Police-court. Before Mr. Byrne. William Murray, James Montgomery, Stephen Carr, each 12 years of age, Patrick Higgins, aged 13, and John Higgins, aged 15, charged with stealing sweets from an automatic machine. They got the sweets by putting pieces of cardboard in the slot. Murray, Montgomery, and Carr seven years each in a reformatory, Patrick Higgins six years, and John Higgins four years.

East Penwith Petty Sessions, Camborne. Before Messrs. W. Rabling, H. T. Broad, T. Moore, and A. E. Permerdan. Richard Henry Williams, labourer, pleaded guilty to a charge of trespassing in pursuit of game. James Mudge, doctor of medicine, was convicted on a similar charge of trespass. The labourer was fined 5s. and costs; the physician, 1s. and costs.

The rule limiting the number of advocates at the Guernsey Bar to six has just been abolished by an ordinance of the Royal Court; but, as anybody acquainted with the management of affairs in the Channel Islands would guess, this step is not the outcome of a disinterested desire for reform. "The delicate question was," says the Guernsey Times, "how to admit another relative to the Bar while at the same time effectually excluding the hated English." The ordinance accomplishes both objects at one stroke, for while throwing open the Bar to another member of the ruling family of the Careys, the ordinance closes it to English barristers by requiring, as a preliminary qualification, five years' residence in the island. It is suggested by a legal correspondent that this latter provision of the ordinance is ultra vires, but I doubt whether the attractions of a practice in the Royal Court of Guernsey are sufficiently great to make it worth the while of English barristers to test the point.

It must be an edifying spectacle to see a police officer instructing a magistrate in the proprieties of judicial conduct. This is what happened during the hearing of a summons at Dewsbury West Riding Court the other day, when the superintendent was impelled to ask if it was right for a magistrate to cross-examine witnesses for the prosecution and partly adjudicate upon a case, and then slip off the Bench and enter the witness-box to give evidence for the defence—evidence which, as it turned out, was irrelevant and inadmissible. The Chairman admitted that it was "an extraordinary thing to do," but the J.P. in question, Mr. J. Brearley, did not at the moment seem to understand that there was anything objectionable or unbecoming in his procedure, though, I trust, he now knows better. As one of the new ex-officio magistrates, he has at any rate the excuse of being a novice at the business of administering justice, which is more than can be said for many of the Great Unpaid whose blunders are brought to my notice.

Judging from an incident that occurred at the Yarmouth Police-court the other day, the Clerk to the Justices there must be a very arrogant and ill-behaved official. A Jew entered the witness-box as the prosecutor in a case, and desired to be sworn on the Old Testament alone, instead of the volume including the New Testament which was presented to him. "I have no other," said the Clerk, "and if you decline to be sworn on that, the case cannot proceed, and I cannot help you." Such a remark ought, of course, to have been rebuked by the Magistrates, but apparently they stand in awe of their clerk, for they meekly concurred in his suggestion that the charge should be struck out. The Jew had, I take it, a perfect legal right to be sworn as he wished, and it was the duty of the Court to provide an Old Testament for the purpose. Even if it were not a matter of legal right, however, his religious scruples should have been treated with respect, as they would be in any properly-conducted court.

What is the relationship? At an inquest on an infant in the Shoreditch Coroner's Court the question arose what had been the relationship of Louisa Mercer to the deceased infant. Louisa Mercer said, on being asked whether there was any, "You see there was, and there was not." Eventually it came out that the second wife of the father of Mrs. Mercer's husband was stepmother to the infant's father's mother's sister: but whether this constituted relationship between Mrs. Mercer and the infant, or not, neither Coroner nor any one else in the Court could make out.

Miss Nellie Lane, alias Lloyd, alias Hamilton, alias Merton, alias Morris, was brought up at Portsmouth on Saturday, on a charge of fraud arising out of the brief career of the "Carlton Society" at Leeds. This is the matter which has several times been referred to in TRUTH, and as Miss Lane is now under remand, I can say nothing more about it at present. I may mention, however, that I have had a visit from an officer who has the case in hand, and there is now no possible doubt that Miss Lane, alias Lloyd, alias Hamilton, &c., &c., of the Leeds Carlton Society, is identical with Miss Lane, alias Miss Brookes, alias Mrs. Lyle, of the St. John's Wood, "Kensington Association."

Reference was made in TRUTH of the 8th inst. to an "impudent trick" run by somebody calling himself "The Advertisers' Association," and using the address "7, Leicester-street, Southport." The trick seems to have been in one sense more "impudent" than I suspected. No. 7, Leicester-street, Southport, is the residence of a gentleman occupying a good position in the Post-office, and, of course, above all suspicion of any connection with such a swindle as that which I have described. It appears that he lent his house to some relatives, equally above suspicion, during September. Neither he nor the temporary occupants of his house had ever heard of the "Advertisers' Association" until they saw TRUTH of October 8; and all the light they can throw on the matter is that during the time the house was thus let, a large number of letters or circulars addressed to somebody unknown arrived there, and that an individual unknown also called on two occasions, asked for the circulars, and took them away. I have before me a whole batch of printed matter issued in connection with the Advertisers' Association, and bearing the address, "7, Leicester-street, Southport," all over it. To all appearance the perpetrator of this swindle, knowing by some means that the owner of the house was temporarily absent, actually had the audacity to use this address, print it on all his advertisements, circulars, and stationery, and then call and possess himself of the resulting communications, in the manner above described! If that is the correct explanation, it is about the most impudent thing of its kind ever done.

In connection with the man Miller, whose true name appears to be Hamblyn, reference was made in TRUTH recently to a brazen puff of the "Perfection System of Investment" in a monthly journal. The publication in question calls itself the West End Magazine, and its connection with Miller would be enough in itself to stamp it as a disgrace to journalism. The article on Miller in the August number was actually reprinted in September, with the addition of no less than six columns of anonymous letters purporting to be written by people who had trusted Miller with their money, and were highly delighted with the result. It was only a week or two after this outrageous puff that Miller informed all his clients that their money was lost. This West End Magazine is not sold by Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son or any ordinary newspaper agents, and appears to be got up expressly for circulation through the post by the individuals who advertise themselves in it. It is therefore not a journal or newspaper in the ordinary sense of the word, but a mere advertising sheet. Doubtless Miller took enough copies of the September issue to pay the whole expenses of the thing for the month, and those who took his money lent themselves to the perpetration of one of the most impudent swindles ever run. The October number has not yet made its appearance. Is this fact in any way due to the abrupt termination of Miller's career?

A gentleman who has suffered many things at the hands of competition mongers and turf touts in consequence of having his name and address published as the winner of a prize offered by a weekly paper, asks me to use my influence in stopping the publication of the names and addresses of those who win such prizes. There is no doubt that circularising swindlers of all classes pay special attention to those whose names are published in this way, but I do not see in what other way newspapers can give unimpeachable evidence that the competition is genuine, and the prize duly awarded. All I can say is that ladies and gentlemen who do not wish to place their names and addresses at the disposal of any advertiser who wants to send them a circular, had better not enter for newspaper competitions. After all, the inconvenience thus caused is no worse than that which follows from the registration of a shareholder's name at Somerset House. Anybody who has ever had the misfortune to get on to the register of a mining Company will know that as soon as his name is registered he becomes a butt for the promoters of every speculation that is floated.

Let me warn all persons afflicted with deafness against responding to any advertisements emanating from one "Thomas Kempe," of Cathedral Offices, 41, St. Andrew's-hill, E.C. This man pretends to have a permanent cure for deafness. A gentleman in the North, who had been entrapped by means of an advertisement, was weak enough to send him in July last the sum of £1. 2s. 9d. He heard nothing more of Kempe, who failed to answer several letters, and then he communicated with TRUTH. I sent a representative to "Cathedral Offices," who, after two or three fruitless visits, found Kempe on the spot. Kempe admitted the receipt of the money, but said that he had been away for his holidays, and would make inquiries as to whether the goods had been forwarded. He was to let me know the result, but did not do so until he had been written to again, when he stated that he found that there had been an accidental oversight in this particular case, but that he had now forwarded his remedy to the gentleman who complained. I wrote to the gentleman in question to ascertain if this was true, and he replied that he had received nothing from Kempe. I have made some further attempts to interview Kempe, but he is never to be found at his office, and it does not seem worth while to waste further time over him. He may be an honest man, but after this experience I could not recommend any one to take the fact for granted.

Latest from Reuben May. In one of his appeals this worthy quotes a letter purporting to have been written to him from the United States, and headed with the following text:—

> Let Reuben live and not die; and let not his men be few.—Deut. xxxiii., 6.

Up to the present Reuben has certainly managed to live very successfully, and I fear that his men—which, I suppose, means his subscribers—have certainly not been few. But whether this result is due to Providence or some other agency I should be sorry to say.

The following is an interesting explanation by Richard Banner Oakley of the circumstances under which he came to be convicted, and to undergo a term of penal servitude. The letter was written to a noble duke, who had been invited to become a patron of the "Road and Path Cycling Association," and who had, much to his credit, declined that honour, and mentioned at the same time that if the reason for his refusal were required, he should be pleased to state it. In reply to this Oakley sent a pamphlet which he has issued under the title of "The Times and the Co-operative Credit Bank," proving, apparently to his own complete satisfaction, that he was wrongfully convicted, and that the Times, to which his exposure was in great part due, is one of the most dishonest and despicable of journals. With the pamphlet he sends a letter, from which I take the following passage:—

> I will conclude by asking your Grace one question. Supposing that your Grace and your friends had been living—say, in the Wild West of America—and had deposited your moneys in a local bank there, and that one fine day, without a moment's warning, the bank had been invaded by a band of desperadoes, the manager gagged and bound hand and foot, the safe opened with dynamite, the contents carried off, and what valuables were not carried off destroyed, the manager himself being kidnapped and detained in captivity for five years; would you say that the manager should henceforth and thenceforth be unfitted for human society? Yet this is, as nearly as possible, a parallel case with that of the Co-operative Credit Bank and myself.

From this it would appear that his prosecution in connexion with the Co-operative Credit Bank was a proceeding exactly on all-fours with the "holding up" of a bank in a Western State, and that the police who arrested him, the judge and jury who tried him, and the officers of the Crown who kept him in durance, are exactly equivalent to a band of desperadoes on a freebooting expedition. I am curious to know whether this is the sort of argument by which other eminent persons in the religious and social world have been induced to become patrons of Mr. Oakley's "Road and Path Cycling Association."

With reference to the begging-letter writer, Charles Leicester, the only surviving son of the Rev. Charles Leicester, and first cousin once removed to the late Right Hon. Lord de Tatley, I learn that the address, "42, Norman-road, St. Leonard's-on-Sea," from which this worthy indites his epistles, is the address of a reading-room, where letters are received at a charge of 1d. each. Leicester is said to be a constant visitor to the room in question, and to receive many letters there, some of them registered. Those who know him read the paragraph in last week's TRUTH with surprise, as he is to all appearance a respectable, well-dressed man, bearing about him none of the signs of either his present or past vocations. I can only hope that, in the course of his visits to the said reading-room during the past week, Leicester has had an opportunity of noting the remarks about him in TRUTH, and that they may lead him to shift the scene of his operations, if not to adopt a more respectable means of livelihood.

There is an advertising loan-monger carrying on business in Conduit-street under the name of Parmer. The following story ought to serve as a warning to needy men against any dealings with him or others of his class—though I confess that warnings in this respect seem to be rather thrown away. An Army officer in temporary difficulties applied to Parmer for a loan of £100 for one month. After one or two interviews, at which he was foolish enough to let Parmer know that he wanted the money urgently and that secrecy was essential, he was induced, in the presence of Parmer and his clerk, to sign a promissory note for £160 for one month, after an attempt had actually been made by Parmer to put the amount at £200. Parmer gave his cheque for £100 and sent his clerk with the client to cash it, on the pretence that the bank might hesitate to give the money to a stranger. The clerk handed in the cheque and received the money, which he forthwith put into his own pocket, and then informed the astonished client that before he handed it over he must first go down to the Times office, to look through the file of the paper and see if the client had ever been made a bankrupt. The officer was wise enough to stick to him, and they went to the Times office together, where the clerk merely put his head inside the door and came out again, with the remark that he did not see his friend there. The officer then demanded that the money should be handed over at once, under threat of calling a constable, upon which the clerk wanted to know what he was going to get for his trouble, and, taking advantage of the obvious reluctance of the client to have a scene in the street, eventually extorted £6, which he called his commission, but which I should call blackmail.

There had been a verbal promise when the note was given that Parmer could renew it when due, if desired. But this promise was, of course, repudiated, and at the end of the month payment of the full £160 was demanded, under threat of a summons. An offer of £130 made by the client was refused, and eventually the whole £160 was extorted. Practically, therefore, this misguided gentleman paid £66 for an advance of £94 for one month. How many hundreds per cent. per annum that amounts to I will leave the reader to work out for himself. This man Parmer advertises in the Morning Post, through which medium the officer in question was entrapped. I would suggest to Sir Algernon Borthwick, who is a very honourable gentleman, that he might, without detriment to himself, decline to become a party to any such rascality by refusing to publish the advertisements of men like this Parmer.

Judging by other newspaper advertisements, the people who patronise quack medicines must be far and away the most gullible section of the public, not even excepting patrons of "system" betting touts and outside brokers. One of the comic weekly newspapers, which makes a specialty of the most objectionable class of advertisements addressed to ladies, has been publishing for months past an advertisement of a Mrs. W. Moore, of the Borough-road, who professes to have a never-failing, absolutely permanent, fat-reducing medicine. By way of testimonial to the virtues of this remedy, Mrs. W. Moore publishes a letter addressed to her from 74, Ondine-road, Peckham, and signed "Very gratefully yours, E. Mostyn." In another column of the same paper appears an advertisement headed "Eyelashes," and stating that "lovely long eyelashes are made to grow like magic by using my Egyptian cream." The advertiser in this instance is "Mrs. Maitland," of 74, Ondine-road, Peckham. During the last week or two it seems to have occurred to one or other of the advertisers—if there is really more than one—that this reappearance of 74, Ondine-road in the two advertisements was a little thin; so the testimonial of Mrs. Mostyn to the virtues of Mrs. Moore's fat-reducing medicine is now dated from Marlborough Villas, Ondine-road. Perhaps I am of an abnormally suspicious disposition, but I should myself consider these two advertisements quite sufficient evidence to satisfy any reasonable being that Mrs. Moore, Mrs. Mostyn, and Mrs. Maitland are all one and the same person.

A sort of appeal ad misericordiam has been addressed to me by the man Wilby, of Savile Town, Dewsbury, whose swindling advertisement was noticed in TRUTH a fortnight ago. The announcement suggests that Wilby wants people to do home-sewing ("plain easy work, forwarded through Parcels Post") by which £1 weekly can be earned; but those who swallow the bait and forward the six stamps for which he asks, only get in return a paper pattern and a small pamphlet purporting to show how such profitable employment can be secured. In his letter to me Wilby descants upon the difficulties he has met with, states that he only makes 24s. a week as an insurance agent, and pleads that what he has done has been with the "one desire to keep his family together." But laudable as the end he has in view may be, it does not justify the means of augmenting his income to which he resorts by publishing this announcement. He seems, indeed, half inclined to admit as much himself, and if it be true, as he alleges, that the business "scarcely pays him," he ought to have no hesitation in dropping it. I strongly advise him to do so, or "the anguish of body and soul," which he says he has suffered through my strictures, may yet be intensified by more unpleasant attentions from another quarter.

When some few weeks ago I expressed in an unguarded moment a desire for enlightenment as to the reason for the incomprehensible variations in chemists' prices, I had little idea that I was stirring up such a hornets' nest. For a full month I was bombarded with letters from all parts of the kingdom, more or less tending to prove that a chemist is quite justified in charging what price he likes for the drugs he sells. I waited till the storm had slackened, and then I endeavoured to make my peace. The only result has been to draw down upon me once more a torrent of correspondence. I really cannot argue this question any further. Let it be understood that no chemist in England, unless it be the "store price" man, agrees with my views, and I think I have done all that can reasonably be expected of me in the interests of justice. I am sure my readers must have had enough of chemists' prices, and I know I have.

One of the druggists who have written to me—and he writes very sensibly—suggests that I should do better to turn my attention to the various phenomena connected with the prices of butchers, drapers, or any other tradesman. After my recent experience I certainly shall do nothing so rash. There is one point, however, which I think should be remembered in favour of the chemists, namely, that for every chemist who makes his fortune out of the public there are probably a hundred butchers who perform the same feat.

In some lucubrations that he contributes to a provincial weekly, under the heading of "Philosophy in Slippers," a Mr. J. F. Nisbet moralises on the subject of wife-beating. Who this Mr. Nisbet may be I know not, and the announcement that he is the author of "Insanity and Genius" fails to enlighten me. But it has been said that "great wits are sure to madness near allied," and, possibly labouring under the delusion that the converse must also be true, Mr. Nisbet seems to be seeking a reputation as a small wit by an assumption of moral aberration. He poses as the champion of the wife-beater, and deprecates my advocacy of the more severe punishment of that amiable character. "I doubt whether wife-beating," he writes, "appears in the same light to the lower classes by whom it is practised as it does to their betters. Let us not forget that the working man has a difficulty in finding words that adequately express his meaning, that he has very little fluency in domestic argument. . . . ." I should not have thought so myself, but let that pass. Mr. Nisbet proceeds: "There is only one argument that he can employ effectively, and which his wife understands—about which, in fact, there is no ambiguity at all—and that is a blow." And this is Philosophy in Slippers! If it be a fair specimen of the article, I fancy the author is more likely to be looked upon as a slippered pantaloon than as a slippered philosopher.

I see that the Chartered Company of South Africa are about to issue 650,000 new shares at a premium of 100 per cent. What may be the assets? A right to the ownership of a country on condition of bearing all costs of administration, which right is already mortgaged heavily for debts. As yet no paying gold has been found in it, and it is worthless if gold be not found. For agricultural purposes it is not climatically attractive to Europeans, and the rinderpest has got so into the ground that it is doubtful whether during the next two years any cattle can live there. The European population in the whole country does not number at most above two or three thousand, mainly spiders waiting for the flies who decline to come. Apart from debts, the issue of 650,000 shares will have to share in any prospective dividends upon above two million shares, almost all of which have been issued gratis to the promoters of the Company. No one knows when the present native war will end, or what it will cost to end it, nor what indemnity the Company will have to pay for the Transvaal raid. A Committee of the House of Commons has been appointed to inquire into all matters connected with the Company, and it is by no means impossible that it will report that it has forfeited its Charter and all ownership in Charterland. Under these circumstances, if fools are found to take up this new issue of shares at 100 per cent. premium, I can only say that fools are plentiful.

The Sultan of Turkey is suffering in public estimation owing to his not having been up to date in his mode of dealing with the Armenians. He ought to have granted to a few of his favourites a concession of Armenia, and allowed them to convert this concession into a Limited Liability Company at a profit of some millions to themselves, which was to be extracted from the pockets of credulous investors under the auspices of some Pasha who had become allied with the Ottoman Imperial family by marriage. Then the Company might have, with a view to civilising the inhabitants of this Chartered Land, laid hands on the property of Kurds and Armenians, and when they objected to this, it might have killed many of them, on the plea of being rebels, and converted the rest into slaves, after burning all their villages. If Armenia were found not worth the outlay involved in this mode of improving its inhabitants off the face of the land, or forcing them to work for their oppressors, the Company might have sought to annex some neighbouring province. I am glad that the Sultan was not sufficiently wide-awake to European public opinion to adopt this course. If he had, and if the Company had interested a sufficient number of our eminent financiers, society pets, and fine ladies, in its success, he would have been able to massacre every Armenian; whilst, far from being blamed for it, he would have been acclaimed a patriot and a philanthropist. Great personages would have resigned their membership of any club which had the temerity to blackball him; great ladies would have lauded him to the skies; and he would have been fêted at the Mansion House.

The St. James's Gazette despairingly gives the following figures for the British Navy and those of the combined Navies of Russia, France, Germany, and Austria:—

	Great Britain.	The Allies.
Line of Battle Ships	75	134
Cruisers	126	113
Coast Defence	53	78
Torpedo Flotilla	291	774

These figures, says the St. James's Gazette, are alarming. They seem to be very far from correct, but that circumstance is less noteworthy than the evidence afforded by the St. James's Gazette that our Jingoes, no longer content with insisting that we ought to have a fleet larger than those of any two other Powers, would now have us bring into existence one larger than the fleets of all the other Powers combined. This would double the expenditure on the Navy, and would, indeed, if we were determined, regardless of cost, to keep up this game of beggar-my-neighbour, probably treble it, for other Powers would at once increase their Navies. And yet, looking at the progress of science, some discovery will doubtless one day be made—a submarine boat, or an aërial machine, or an infernal machine of some kind—which will revolutionise all naval warfare.

In the meantime, whilst we are building ships, and putting our Naval expenditure on a permanent war footing, the Germans are cutting us out of the open markets of the world by greater intelligence at the game of commerce. If we spent more on technical schools and less on armaments to enable us to defend all the useless territory that we are perpetually grabbing, we should become richer, wiser, and happier. Our special want just now seems to be commercial travellers able to speak the languages of the countries where they seek for orders, and to distinguish precisely what their inhabitants want. I would rather see a Commercial Travellers' School established by the Government than hear of their building a dozen more battle-ships.

Judging by Lord Rosebery's speech at Colchester, he has come to the conclusion that the Tory Party is to be his oyster in the future, and he contemplates bidding for its Leadership by out-Jingoing Lord Salisbury. As he would, I think, be the right man in the right place, I sincerely trust that he will succeed. Honestly, I seriously believe that there is the making of a Conservative Leader in him. He is a nobleman, and the genuine article; not an ennobled rich man. He is passing wealthy, and by marriage he is connected with the City. He stands well at Court. He is, so far as form goes, an excellent speaker, and his ambiguities in respect to political matters may be ascribed to his having been in a somewhat false position as a Radical Leader. As a writer, he is very much above the ordinary run of Lords with a fad for publishing their lucubrations. He is a past master of banter, and in his social relations he is reputed—I believe with justice—to be eminently agreeable. He is a patron of British sport, and has won the Derby. In home politics I do not think that he has greatly compromised himself as a Radical. He has never professed any zeal for such reforms as one man one vote, or payment of members, and although he used to be hyper-fervid for the taxation of ground values, he never broached the subject when he was in a position to give the matter practical effect. He is not an ardent Home Ruler, and would do nothing until the whole of England declares for it. Although he would reform the House of Lords, he deems any reform to which their lordships would not assent to be revolutionary, and more than this no Conservative can ask. He has never stated his views in regard to temperance.

On foreign policies his record is unimpeachable. When Liberal Premier, he brought us, as he has informed us, within twenty-four hours of a war with France about some dispute connected with that Siam frontier that at one time greatly exercised our Jingoes, but which they have now forgotten. He forced on us a railway to Uganda by informing his recalcitrant colleagues that he would resign if they did not agree to our wasting a few millions on it. He diligently occupied himself in pegging-out claims for futurity in tropical Africa where no European colonists can thrive, and he paved the way for the Soudanese expedition by incidentally announcing that the whole of the upper valley of the Nile in some mysterious fashion belongs to us.

I fail to see how Lord Rosebery's reply to Mr. Courtney is any reply to the comments of that gentleman on the Colchester speech. Mr. Courtney had urged that we should withdraw from Egypt, as we were there in defiance of our pledges to Europe, a position which necessarily shook European confidence in us. Replying to this suggestion, Lord Rosebery said that the policy of Mr. Courtney is one "well known in the police-courts," called the "confidence trick," which "consists of two parties, the simpleton and the knave," by means of which "the knave walks off with the property of the simpleton." Lord Rosebery now says that Mr. Courtney distorts a humorous allusion in saying that this parallel implies that Egypt is our property, and that the Great Powers are knaves. But what other inference can be drawn? There are two persons, a knave and a simpleton, in the parallel. If we are not the knave, then the Great Powers must be. The knave "walks off with the property of the simpleton." What property? Egypt. Obviously, therefore, Egypt is deemed by Lord Rosebery our property, otherwise where would be the point in the parallel? But, further on in his speech he makes it still more clear that he regards Egypt as our property. Referring again to Mr. Courtney's suggestion, he says: "You have a mighty Empire on your shoulders; you can, in order to inspire confidence in others, peel from it province after province, and hand it over to those who regard you with suspicion." What other conclusion can any one draw except that, in his lordship's opinion, Egypt is a British Province; for the discussion turns on Egypt, and on nothing else? Oysters, we are told nowadays, sometimes are productive of typhoidal symptoms; but they do not, like wine, cause mental obfuscation. Lord Rosebery clearly meant what his words imply, but, when the meaning is pointed out by Mr. Courtney, he falls back—not for the first or the second time—on a denial that they can bear the only interpretation possible. What I would ask Lord Rosebery, were I Mr. Courtney, would be to explain to us, in clear words, without humorous allusions, what are his views in regard to our occupation of Egypt.

SCRUTATOR.

HOW ELIJAH'S MANTLE WAS STOLEN.

I HAVE come across many Radical M.P.s, and I have found none who do not hold that Lord Rosebery's Leadership was a serious impediment to democratic advance. That the Leadership of Sir William Harcourt creates wild enthusiasm amongst them, it would, perhaps, be exaggeration to assert, but they stand to the principle that the Leader in the Commons is de facto the Leader of the Party, and that the Leader of the Party must be Premier whenever the Party has a parliamentary majority. From this position, present and prospective, there is no desire to oust Sir William. This is the view taken, I think, by the Radicals in the constituencies. Lord Rosebery never "caught on" with them; his Leadership was sullenly acquiesced in, and all the efforts now being made by his devoted friends to perpetuate the vacancy until he is good enough to condescend to fill it have fallen flat.

When Mr. Asquith tells us that the whole Liberal Party regrets Lord Rosebery's resignation, he expresses, consequently, only his own views and those of a few. Any Liberal Association is ready to speed the parting guest with a few complimentary phrases; but between this and a wish to renew an experiment that has already proved so fatal in its results, there is a wide difference. This, I am informed, is the attitude of most of the organs of provincial public opinion. The suggestion put forward that Sir William should be allowed the privilege of leading the House of Commons without leading the Party when in opposition, in order that the prerogative of the Queen to select a Premier may be reserved to her, is too obviously a scheme to place the Liberal Premiership in the safe keeping of some Court-appointed Peer, and too contrary to the most elementary notion of all popular rule, to command assent; nor is the Peer Premiership further recommended to Radicals by the fact that it is supported by the entire Unionist press on the ground that Radicals are socially, intellectually, and morally such a contemptible collection of waifs and strays, that they need the controlling leadership of some noble Rehoboam to give them even an air of respectability, and to save the country from being ruined if they have a majority.

When Lord Rosebery was made Prime Minister it was diligently put about that Mr Gladstone had nominated him to the Queen as his successor, and that, consequently, to disapprove of the selection was to disapprove of Mr. Gladstone. Elijah had, we were assured, handed his mantle to Elisha, and it was for us to transfer our allegiance to the new prophet. It is now admitted, however, that Elijah had no desire to relinquish his mantle, but that it was transferred to another proprietor against his wish. Lord Rosebery, in fact, became Prime Minister by the decision of the majority of his colleagues, which had in some mysterious and backstairs mode been communicated to the Queen. The true facts that led to Mr. Gladstone's withdrawal from public life have never been told. He wrote from Biarritz to say that the condition of his eyes would necessitate an operation, which would render it impossible for him to attend during some weeks to public business; he therefore adumbrated his resignation of the Premiership. When he returned to England, no overture was made to him to lay up for a brief period, and he found himself in a minority in his own Cabinet as to the amount of public money to be expended on the Navy. Perceiving that the House of Lords was either vetoing or emasculating all the Liberal measures passed in the House of Commons, he proposed to his colleagues a dissolution, and an appeal to the country against the Lords under his leadership. This was declined, on which he placed his resignation in the hands of the Queen, who cheerfully accepted it, and, without asking him who should succeed him, at once sent for Lord Rosebery. It will be seen, therefore, that the Liberal Party has had to thank the majority of Mr. Gladstone's last Cabinet for depriving us of the invaluable services of that trusted veteran; for preventing an appeal to the country on the action of the Lords; and for the dreary ploughing of the sands of the sea that made the Party ridiculous in the sight of men and angels; as well as for having sacrificed that keystone of Liberalism, the presence of the Liberal Premier in the House of Commons. Certainly few men have ever been privileged to perform such valuable services to their political opponents. There may possibly be worse Governments than that of a little oligarchy of wire-pullers and place-hunters; but a more contemptible Government cannot well be conceived. It would be interesting to know who were the majority who insisted on a Peer being the Premier. Was it not that three or four refused to serve under the Commoner, and that the others, fearing a general break up of the happy family, knocked under to this menace? Thus three or four persons, by sacrificing principle to personal jealousies and animosities, ruined a great historical party. Really, if we are to perpetuate this scheme of Party Government, we ought to regard as the perfection of statecraft the revolutions engineered by eunuchs and such like statesmen, by means of which, in Oriental palaces, one Sultan is smothered and another put in his place.

So far as the Leadership of the Liberal Party is concerned, I regard the matter as practically settled. It will be the Leader of the Commons, whoever that Leader may be. Those who are opposed to the actual occupant of the former post must, if they would effect a change, fight in the open, instead of intriguing with the Court, the Peers, and the Tories to effect their purpose. Their course is simple: let them summon, if they please, a Party meeting, and depose Sir William Harcourt; but, if not prepared to do this, let them loyally accept him. My own conviction is that we might go further and fare worse. I support him because he is the Commons Leader, and shall continue to do so until either he ceases to be it or until he renounces the Radical creed. If the Leader in the Commons happened to be Mr. J. Morley or Mr. Asquith, or any other of Mr. Gladstone's lieutenants in the Commons, I should in the same fashion support him, so long as he did nothing to conflict with Radical principles.

We want a definite Leader and a definite electoral programme. But without sound organisation, the best of Leaders and the best of programmes will not assure us the victory. Our organisation is rotten to the core. It has lapsed into a ring of wire-pullers, seeking to dictate to all local Liberal Associations in regard to men and measures, as though they were children. This has deprived the Liberal Party of that vitality without which it cannot thrive, with the result that the most energetic workers either have lost all zeal, or have separated themselves from the Party, and thus local associations, deprived of their best elements, have become mere whited sepulchres, controlled and dominated by some wire-puller who is the agent of the centralisers. Against all this I have always protested, because the Liberal Party can only hope for success when organised upon popular lines. As soon as Parliament meets it is to be hoped that action will be taken to alter the present state of things.

Whether with the best of Leaders, the best of battle cries, and the best of organisation, we shall win the next General Election, I do not know; nor can any one know. What we have to do is to try to win, and to adopt the means that will make victory possible. We must, too, take good care that, if we do win, we shall pull the chestnuts out of the fire for ourselves and not for others. At the last General Election I confess that, what seemed to me to be a certainty of defeat, did not disquiet me. Indeed, to be perfectly candid, I was glad when we were defeated, for we were on the wrong path, and I thought it full time that we should be awakened to this by some clap of thunder. The Radicals are to the official Liberals as ten to one in the constituencies, and are like the subjects at an hypnotic séance. An attempt was being made, with a certain measure of success, to make them believe that the luke-warm and muddy water which was being served out to them was the pure water of Democracy undefiled. May the experience of the last Election prove useful to us! We shall be the silliest of fools if we do not profit by it, or if we allow a noisy claque, and an insignificant clique, once more to lead us to perdition.

SERVICE MEN, BEWARE!

The relations between "Service" journals, more particularly as represented by the Broad Arrow, and the military and naval authorities have been the subject of many adverse comments in Truth. As a rule, the occasion for such comment has been the championing in such journals, and more particularly in the Broad Arrow, of the cause of Officialdom as against that of individual victims of official oppression and injustice. But there have not been wanting indications that the part thus undertaken — ignoble and contemptible as it must appear in the case of a journal posing as the representative of the general interests of the Service—has not been confined to the mere acceptance of a brief for the War Office or the Admiralty. In more than one instance officers have had reason to believe that where they have themselves attempted to use these journals, the Broad Arrow more particularly, for the ventilation of Service opinions on questions either of public or professional importance, the confidence which they have reposed in the Editor has been violated by the disclosure of their identity to superior authorities desirous of ascertaining it. That such things have been done has hitherto been merely a matter of suspicion, though of very strong suspicion; but I am now in possession of evidence which directly implicates the Editor of the Broad Arrow in the perpetration of this form of ignoble treachery. In saying this I make what I consider, and what I believe the public will consider, a very grave imputation upon the conduct of a brother journalist, and I will therefore give such facts as are sufficient to enable the Broad Arrow to meet and refute this charge, if it can.

About a year ago a discussion arose in the Broad Arrow on a technical question affecting a certain department of military administration. Several officers, specially familiar with the subject under discussion, contributed their views in letters to the Broad Arrow, signing their communications with noms de plume, but, in accordance with the invariable rule of journalism, giving their names to the Editor confidentially, in token of good faith. From the nature of the case, it followed that the views expressed by some of the writers were distasteful to the official heads of the department concerned. By some means the officer at the head of this department became aware of the names of the writers of all these letters. This is proved by the simple fact that he made no secret of his knowledge. He boasted that he knew the writers, and justified his boast by mentioning several names correctly. Further, and this is the blackest spot in the business, this officer openly stated that he had his information from the Editor or proprietor of the Broad Arrow personally.

Now these facts I have on evidence which is not open to any question. If I do not clearly specify the names of the parties and the nature of the circumstances, it is only because I do not wish to walk in the footsteps of the Broad Arrow, by enabling the military authorities for a second time to identify officers who have communicated with the Press. What I have said is sufficient to enable the Editor of the Broad Arrow to recognise the transaction to which I refer, and to meet the accusation against him, if he is in a position to do so. But what explanation he can give I am at a loss to imagine, unless by imputing untruthfulness to the officer who has stated that he had the information from him. This much, at any rate, is certain—that the names of those officers who had written to the Broad Arrow were divulged to the military authorities. That information can only have come from some one in the office of the Broad Arrow. The Editor of that publication may deny that he personally communicated the information. In that case it will be a question between his assertion and that of an officer whose honour and integrity are, so far as I am aware, irreproachable. But even if such a denial be made on the part of the Editor, the ugly fact remains that information communicated to the Editor privately and confidentially, was, by some one connected with the paper, disclosed to the military authorities. Whatever, therefore, Mr. Burgess Short may say for himself, the imputation is unanswerable so far as his journal is concerned.

The character of this act will be self-evident to every man of honour; but in the eyes of journalists of all classes it will appear in a special degree dishonourable. If there is one rule of conduct which every editor of a respectable journal holds sacred, it is the obligation to respect, at whatever risk to himself, the confidence of those who communicate with him confidentially. An editor is under no obligation to publish a confidential communication, but if he elects to do so, he binds himself, as an honourable man, to the conditions on which it is placed at his disposal. Newspaper proprietors may differ as to the precise length to which they are bound to go in protecting a correspondent or informant, where third parties have legal grounds for complaint against any statement so communicated. Speaking for myself, no consideration, short of irresistible compulsion in the interests of justice, would ever induce me to disclose the source of any information, when I have once taken the responsibility of publishing it, unless it could be shown that I had myself been wilfully and dishonestly imposed upon; and I believe that in saying this I am not going beyond the rule which would be accepted by the proprietors of every leading English journal. But in this instance there is no question whatever of the extent to which the obligation may go in extreme cases. This is a case in which the Editor of the Broad Arrow, or those for whom he is responsible, have deliberately and wantonly betrayed the confidence reposed in them. This they have done, not under any necessity, compulsion, or even pressure, but voluntarily, and for no reason—unless to serve their own private ends. I have questioned before now the right of the Broad Arrow to the character it claims of an organ of the Military and Naval Services. A journal has, to my mind, no right to the title of "Service" journal, which, whenever there is a conflict between the dogmatic decrees of officialdom and the interests of the Service at large or of its individual members, invariably constitutes itself the mouthpiece of officialism and the apologist of tyranny and injustice. But if any man has a fancy for such dirty work as that, he has a right to undertake it, just as he would have to lick the Commander-in-Chief's boots if he thought the pay good enough. A journalist is, of course, within his right, if he so pleases, to place his columns, for any quid pro quo, at the absolute disposal of the War Office or the Admiralty, and to act as a semi-official penman while posing as an organ representative of the Services. But it is not within the right of any journalist who assumes to represent the Services to invite—expressly or impliedly—members of the Services to communicate with him in that character, and then to run round to the first official who may disapprove of what has been published with a list of the names of those who have accepted his invitation. This is an act of the vilest and meanest treachery.

China and Glass. — Messrs. Goode, Artists and Designers, solicit an inspection of their collection in their recently-extended South Audley-street premises, now by far the largest and most important in Europe. Messrs. Goode guarantee the excellence of all their productions, and invite a comparison of their prices with those of any co-operative stores.

AN M.P. FOR THE JUBILEE HOSPITAL.

Another "special and urgent appeal" is now in circulation on behalf of the Queen's Jubilee Hospital, Earl's Court. It states among other things that this institution "is the only free general hospital which is situated in the midst of a large and indigent population." This statement will strike many as a startling one, and I have it from one of the first living authorities on the Metropolitan hospital system that it is an absolute falsehood. Can anything be more discreditable than that such a statement should go forth in a document appealing for money, and bearing among other names that of the Rev. W. R. Mowll, Vicar of Christ Church, Brixton, as chairman of the Board of Management? Even this, however, is but a small matter by comparison with the long series of scandals in which the Queen's Jubilee Hospital has been involved by the connection of Mr. R. F. Benham with it; and I earnestly hope that no living soul will be so foolish as to contribute to the funds of an institution with such a disreputable history.

With this same appeal there is being circulated a "Report of the speech delivered by W. Hayes Fisher, Esq., M.P., Junior Lord of the Treasury, at the first annual sports in aid of the Jubilee Hospital." In this speech Mr. Fisher passes a most glowing eulogy upon the work of the hospital, while commending it to the consideration of the benevolent. Far be it from me to criticise too severely the artifices by which an M.P. is compelled to woo his constituents. Necessity makes politicians acquainted with strange bedfellows. But when a Junior Lord of the Treasury extends his patronage to a gentleman of Mr. R. F. Benham's reputation, he ought at least to know what he is doing, and I cannot seriously believe that even the member for the borough would have appeared in public as the champion of the Jubilee Hospital, had he taken the trouble to master the true history of that institution since Mr. R. F. Benham and his brother first set it going in 1887. Nor can Mr. Fisher say in defence of his ignorance that he is concerned, not with the past history of the institution, but with its present work. What Mr. Benham and the Jubilee Hospital were in the beginning, such they are now. I would remind Mr. Fisher, and any others who may think that the scandal is a thing of the past, that only within the last few weeks the termination has been witnessed of one of the most discreditable incidents in the entire history of this disreputable institution, and this incident dates only from the present year. Here is an outline of the facts for Mr. Hayes Fisher's consideration.

A few months back a Mrs. McKinnell, who has been hand in glove with R. F. Benham for many years past, was soliciting subscriptions for the Jubilee Hospital. One of her letters was addressed to a gentleman well known for his sympathy with and services to hospital work in London. This gentleman replied by referring the lady to the unanswered charges in TRUTH against Benham in connection with the Jubilee Hospital finances. One of these charges was that in the course of the long years during which Benham had been posing as a munificent benefactor to the Hospital, he was really in an impecunious condition, as most conspicuously demonstrated by his failure to settle up a matter of a few pounds, due from him to the representatives of a poor patient, of whose will he had got himself appointed executor. By way of answer to this charge Mrs.

SAVOY HOTEL, Savoy Restaurant, London. Large reception-rooms for fashionable réunions. Orchestra plays daily during dinner and opera supper.

McKinnell forwarded to the gentleman from whom she was soliciting subscriptions a copy of a letter written to Mr. R. F. Benham by a solicitor named Baker. This letter had obviously been given to her by Benham for the purpose of being used in this way. Now let us look at the history of this letter.

Baker, who wrote the letter, was the solicitor who had been employed to recover from Benham the money which he had received as executor of his dying patient. Baker's character may be judged from the fact that the little money he did recover from Benham he failed to account for until his clients brought an action against him through another solicitor. A balance of the money due from Benham never was recovered, and Baker clearly knew this, as he had actually made an attempt to attach the money on his own account in satisfaction of his costs. This was the state of things in May, 1895, when Benham's relations with the Jubilee Hospital were brought under the notice of the General Medical Council. A few days before that inquiry—obviously with the purpose of getting rid of one of the strongest points against him—Benham went to Baker, and by some means which must be left to the imagination obtained from the solicitor a letter certifying that "to the best of his (Baker's) remembrance and belief," all the money due from Benham in his character of executor had been paid up by him. This statement must have been false to the knowledge of Baker, who wrote it, because, as I have said, he had actually made an attempt to attach on his own account the money still remaining due from Benham; and, besides, he had in his possession all the papers relating to the case, and had therefore no occasion to trust to his "remembrance and belief." That the statement was also false to the knowledge of Benham, who obtained it for his own purposes, goes without saying. This, then, is the letter which was at the beginning of this year given by Benham to his friend Mrs. McKinnell for the purpose of influencing the judgment of a gentleman who was hesitating about subscribing to the Jubilee Hospital after what he had read in TRUTH.

It should be added that when this letter was brought to my knowledge, I at once took steps to have Baker's conduct in writing it brought before the Council of the Incorporated Law Society. The matter was in due course threshed out before the Council, and I believe that the Incorporated Law Society would have dealt with Baker upon it, but for the fact that they had already investigated another charge of professional misconduct against him, on which they had decided to apply for his expulsion from the profession. On this other case, Baker was struck off the rolls only a few weeks ago, and by this fact, and this alone, he was saved from an adverse decision on the Benham-McKinnell letter.

These facts alone should be sufficient to satisfy any one of the justice of my observation that Mr. Benham and the Jubilee Hospital are to-day precisely what they always have been. Here we see in 1896, after the exposure of all the past scandals connected with the institution, a deliberate attempt by Benham to impose on the public and obtain subscriptions for his hospital by means of a document which he knew to be false, which the man who wrote it knew to be false, and which had been obtained in the first instance for the purpose of imposition. In spite of all this, and of all that has gone before it, Benham retains his prominent position in connection with the Jubilee Hospital, and those who have throughout acquiesced in or connived at his proceedings, evince no desire to relieve the institution of such a scandal. The charitable public have, for the most part, realised the character of the concern, and ceased to contribute to it. Thus deserted, Benham has thrown himself upon the support of the working classes of the surrounding districts, who know nothing, and so far as I can see (for some of them have been to TRUTH office to interview me on the subject) care nothing, as to Benham's character or past performances. By means of street processions, public meetings, and Trade Union collections, it is now sought to keep alive an institution with so disreputable a history that the ordinary subscribing public will have nothing to do with it; and some show of popular interest and enthusiasm having been thus excited, the M.P. for the borough is easily induced to identify himself with the proceedings. Although not of his political complexion, I do not wish in this connection to interfere with Mr. Hayes Fisher in any steps he may take for catching votes. But it will be my duty to prevent him from simultaneously catching subscriptions from unsuspicious people of benevolent impulses. I trust, therefore, that Mr. Fisher's advocacy will be taken for what it is worth, and nothing more, and that the charitable public will continue to abstain from all support of Mr. Benham's hospital, so long as Mr. Benham and his past associates remain connected with it.

"SAUCE PIQUANTE" AT THE ROYALTY.

Sauntering about town the other day I encountered a delicate odour of spice scenting the atmosphere around Dean-street, Soho, and as I drew near the Royalty Theatre its pungency grew stronger, and at last its attractive power proved so alluring that I felt myself compelled to enter the little playhouse to discover the cause of this decidedly fascinating perfume. Once inside the door of the theatre, although occasionally the hot and highly-flavoured ragout for the moment stuck in my throat, and burned, I found, when once I had swallowed the dainty morsels, digestion was comparatively easy; nay, more, I felt irresistibly interested in the wicked manœuvres of M. Feydeau's Palais Royal hero. Verily the French author possesses a perfect genius for intrigue, and never was it carried to such a pitch of elaborate detail and open suggestiveness as now. The subtle aside, the sly wink, and the knowing cough are all put on one side, and a broad blue line is substituted instead; but perhaps this is because people are not so quick at grasping a situation or catching a joke as they once were. An American comedian, was once asked how he liked to act before an English audience, and he replied:—

> Well, see here, they may be a darned clever nation, but I guess they ought to have a bell rung to show 'em where the laughs come in.

Anyhow, there is no reason for bell-ringing any more; in fact, one scene in the new farce at the Royalty evidently so shocked the stage manager that he hastily lowered the curtain before the act was over, and now I want to know, and am burning with curiosity to know, what I have missed. But oh! terror of terrors, could that same stage manager have suddenly caught the eagle eye of the "licenser of plays" from the stalls?

The plot is Parisian to the very backbone. A confiding, tender wife is suddenly transformed into a demoniacally jealous virago by the discovery of a certain volume of notes made by her first husband, whom she fondly believed to be a model of propriety and a faithful better half. This choice literary work contains all the most outrageous schemes by which he succeeds in hoodwinking his unsuspicious little wife. The present husband is informed what an innocent creature the lovely Ellis Jeffreys is; and conceive his horror when he discovers she is, thanks to her late husband's book of "useful information," up to every "little dodge" on the face of the earth. She bribes the maid to bring her all Fred Terry's letters; he, good boy, goes one better, doubles the bribe, and gets his correspondence delivered safely. Fortune has bestowed on this handsome libertine the gift of hypnotising, and this he turns to some account by using its influence on his now ever-suspicious wife. Evening after evening the poor deluded Ellis Jeffreys is "willed" to pose herself gracefully on a comfortable sofa, where, reclining on most becoming brocaded cushions, she rests peacefully whilst her faithless lord goes out "on the spree," and returns to give three whiffs on the snow-white brow of the fair Ellis, which awakens her to love and life once more.

Anon enters Weedon Grossmith from Venezuela, disguised as a gay Lothario. He loves madly, desperately, but in a sad, forlorn sort of way, the magnetic gentleman's wife In a weak moment Fred confides the secret of his "little dodge" to Weedon, who wakes the "entranced lady" up and bids her sham by-by once more, which she does, and overhears, to her horror, a scene between her guilty spouse and an outraged husband, who has just caught Mr. Fred trying to hypnotise the wife of his bosom. Subterfuge is useless. Lies are of no avail. The book containing the record of 360 intrigues does not contain this, henceforth she knows of 361, and this dodge fairly "takes the biscuit." At last an idea strikes Ellis: she, too, will confess to deception and fraud—she, too, will own to a lover: why not? "I am quite as fascinating as Fred, if not quite so experienced;" so she owns to her perfidious husband that she not only received a lover during his absence, but more, that she liked it! "I'll not believe it," says Fred; but yes, it is, it must be true, for here is a waistcoat buckle sticking to the balcony railings. "And now to meet the man without the buckle." He is "raked up" in the person of the gardener, who is secretly married to the lady's maid, and is in the habit of paying his respects to his "old woman" on the strict Q.T. Fred asks to be forgiven, Ellis owns to having resorted to a little ruse, Weedon returns to Venezuela, and Mr. Maltby goes back to the arms of his unmagnetised wife.

Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy has gone as near the precipice as wisdom and decency permit, in fact he was on several occasions within an ace of toppling over, but Miss Ellis Jeffreys pulled him back just in time. Feydeau and French farce are at present all the rage! Next, please! Who has bought "Le Dindon," and who is going to produce it?

"LOVE IN IDLENESS."

Mr. Edward Terry is a genuine comedian with a delightful style, and in the new play Mr. E. J. Goodman and Mr. Louis N. Parker have fitted him like a glove. They know the actor's quaintness, they appreciate his delicacy of touch, and they have, in Edward Terry, established the true meaning of "serio-comic" acting. Very rarely do we find plays so well conceived and so well constructed as this. Its only fault is that perhaps it is too delicate and dainty for an age as robust, as rough, and, I may add, as cynical as this. The affectation of the moment is to sneer at sentiment, to laugh at love scenes, to roar at an honest kiss on the stage, and to pretend that human nature is all wrong. The plot of the new play is very true, very human, very simple. A man who has been disappointed in the one great passion of his life, who loves a woman and loses her, drifts into inertness, lassitude, nothingness. He is discovered when the curtain rises with his handkerchief over his eyes dozing in a pretty, flower-scented garden. This fatal habit of procrastination not only ruins the life of the hero of the play, it does grievous harm to those who are dear to him and are attached to his genial, sunny nature. So this dreamy, dozy man stirs himself to action. And when he does act he makes more mistakes than when he was inert. But he happily succeeds in winning back the love of the good woman he has lost, and having secured that, he goes to sleep again in the same dreamy old summer garden.

Had the play been written by a French dramatist, it would be overladen with praise and quoted as "an idyll." "Sweethearts" and "Sweet Lavender" do not contain better dramatic material. But as ill luck will have it the play comes when sentiment is a bad dramatic bargain. We shall get round to it again in time. Romantic drama is at present in the ascendant. That style of entertainment will have its little day. And then we shall get back to "Caste" and "Sweet Lavender." As I have said before, the flowret is perhaps too delicate and sensitive for the rough keen air of a modern theatre. It suggests a scenario rather than a play. It wants filling out, writing up and elaborating. But such as it is, there is charm in every scene, thought in every character, and I hope that Mr. Goodman and Mr. Parker will work together again, and give to the stage plays as sweet and sincere as "Love in Idleness." There must be hundreds of playgoers who find more delight in the gentle tone of such a play as this than in the unbridled lubricity of the last sensation from the Palais Royal in Paris. The one makes people think and pause. The other makes them draw back and look askance.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

SNOBS AND SNOBINETTES.

I NEVER until last Thursday knew of a current boulevard subject being discussed at the yearly meeting of the Academies. The innovator was one of the Forty, M. Jules Lemaître, critic, novelist, dramatic author, and one who manages to keep pace with the time. His subject was "Les Snobs et le Snobbism." Thackeray would have said that M. Lemaître knew nothing about it. Though the meaning of snobbism has changed since his time, I think that M. Lemaître has extended it overmuch. Does it not, in English at any rate, mean a vulgar fellow who tries to hide his coarse grain and want of gentlemanly education by affecting fashionable airs, and attaching more importance than is meet to externals? In the sense attached to it by M. Lemaître, any Society affectation is snobbish. It is snobbish to be in ecstasies about a painter because he may happen to be on the crest of the wave. Snobs cast flowers before the actress or singer honoured (or dishonoured) by Royal attentions. In short, being time-serving for the sake of being in the swim is snobbish. Snobbism is to polite good manners what Ritualism is to hoary Roman orthodoxy. It looks merely to the outside of the platter, and parrots the criticisms of the right sort of people. Under no circumstances can it be a medium for a quickening spirit. All snobs are as dull as ditch-water. The Morphine Club is a natural effect of French snobbism. There rich snobs can find refuge from their own and their fellow-snobs' dulness.

M. Jules Lemaître, had he lived at Bath when it was the fashionable resort of England, would have classed Beau Nash as a snob, though he was a singularly clever man. Perhaps Beau Brummel and his Fat Friend were snobs, and the latter the more snobbish of the two. The brilliant Academician seems bent on giving "le snobbism" a place in the French Dictionary. He speaks of the word as of recent coinage; but he says that the thing is of old date. The Hôtel de Rambouillet appears in his discourse as a centre of snobbism, and Madelin and Cathos as snobinettes—a word entirely coined by M. Lemaître. When Corneille went out of fashion, the literary snobs, he said, lauded Racine. Another generation of snobs were for Locke's Philosophy, and were Anglomaniacs. They were followed by snobs who worshipped sensibility and nature at the altars of Rousseau and Bernardin St. Pierre. The rusticities of the Trianon were the snobbisms of a charming young Queen. The snobs of Optimism, who saw no faults in human nature, hatched the Reign of Terror.

According to M. Lemaître, there can be charming snobbism. I am sorry never to have found it. Has any one ever felt at ease with a snob, or felt at home in his house? Is there any rest for soul or eye in a snob's drawing-room, or even in a snob's library, however well the bookshelves are furnished? I know a snob who has all the higher shelves furnished with false backs that look like real volumes in expensive binding. Is it possible to read with any pleasure in a room where there is such a constant reminder of insincerity, and the wish to dazzle one's neighbour by false pretences? The owner of these false book-backs might have bought a glorious library with all the money he pays the Figaro and Gaulois to advertise his dinners, at which he generally manages to have prize guests with resonant names. The business of his life has been to be mixed up and confounded with such people. To do him justice, he does not require to be fed on flattery—an appetite now common to millionaire snobs and snobesses.

Have you remarked how nervously alert the snob who rolls in riches is for signs of admiration from his guests when he gives a feast? The late Baron H. used to give in the smoking-room cigars that cost 25 fr. apiece. If the smoker did not go into ecstasies, he would say, "Take another. You will not get as good a one at home," and then he told what they had cost him.

Baron B. has a portrait gallery of sirens in whom he took, and takes, an interest. He borrowed the idea from the Warblers' Portrait Gallery of the late King of the Netherlands, to which the late M. Chaplain contributed so many paintings. Chaplain was also painter in ordinary to Baron B. for his Sirens' Gallery. This snob, who has the virtue of being shrewd and amusing, entertains his guests with oral biographies of the beauties hung there. Here is a specimen monograph: "That's la Vicomtesse de Porto Vecchio, otherwise Catelina. I married her off to young Maison, of the Banque Saharienne. The dot was the directorship of the bank and—well, I must not tell, lest I should be taxed with wanting to dazzle people with the sum of money given with the place, to say nothing of the house they live in. You know the house. Prince Roland wanted to buy it, before he built the palace he now lives in. Catelina led a stormy life before I fell in with her. She says she's the daughter of a Grand Duchess who went from Biarritz on a romantic excursion into Spain. Catelina was one of the consequences of the trip. She was put out to nurse at St. Sebastian, and was forgotten by father and mother. When she grew up she went to sell fish at Bordeaux, and got into the hands of a dealer in beauty. Her local fame became great. Queen Zenobia, in passing through, heard of her. She is more like a fatted rhinoceros than a woman, and knows it. In despair at her own face and unwieldy figure, she passionately admires clean-built beauty in others, as some people admire Greek sculpture. She is as much interested in a Hebe or a Venus as in an Adonis or an Apollo. Queen Zenobia gloated on Catelina, took her by the hand, made her a wardrobe woman, and bought for her a Pontifical title. What was more valuable, she obtained for her the power to deal with State contracts and concessions. This is why I knew her. We did business together for some time before Zenobia quarrelled with her and got the privileges withdrawn. Catelina is a wonderful hostess. One sees in her manners at table the blood of the Grand Duchess. Hasn't she also an imperial temper? It grew too strong for me, and I was very glad when I could marry her off handsomely."

The late Comtesse de Paiva, afterwards Countess Henkel-Donnersmarck, must have been an arrant snob. Her grandeur froze most of the beaux esprits who used to go to her dinners. A state of perpetual admiration was required. They were not bound to admire her, if they admired her ceilings painted by Baudry, the repoussé handles of the vermeil forks, the old Dresden Chelsea, and Sèvres plates on which the dinner was served, the toy lap-dogs, the onyx stairs, the oak buffets, credences, and what not, carved in the round, in the block. There can be no rest for the eye or spirit in a snobbish drawing-room, where each object is meant to force notes of admiration from the guests. However exquisite the cuisine, the dishes somehow are unpalatable. Snobs at bottom have no opinion of themselves, and this M. Lemaître forgot to say. They are like a child that takes no pleasure in being noisy when alone.

He also ignored the snobinette who would pass at the expense of others for a Lady Bountiful, and who gets in with people of the right sort at fancy fairs for charitable purposes.

There being no Emperor and Empress of Russia to occupy ourselves with, Paris has been busy with the Ste. Beuve mystery, and the letters of George Sand to Doctor Pagello. There is a mysterious something in the Hugo—Ste.-Beuve correspondence. There can be no doubt that Mme. Victor Hugo is the person of whom poet and critic speak. She was then quite a young woman, and very beautiful. Spanish beauty was at that time the fashion in the studios, and she was said to look like a Spaniard. She died a few years before the break up of the Empire. I quite remember her. She had beaux restes, but I do not think she could ever have had a face to captivate an experienced person. Victor Hugo married her soon after he left school, and Ste. Beuve was a very young man when he fell in love with her. And did he fall in love with her? He says in his jottings: "Je n'ai jamais aliéné ma volonté et mon jugement, hormis une fois dans le monde de Hugo, et par l'effet d'un charme le plus puissant et le plus doux, celui qui enchaînait Renaud dans le Jardin d'Armide." The famous critic did not know what sentimental love was. He attempted to enact romances with a strong-minded, artistic, free-love Princess, who filled one of the very front places in national and international society; he was l'ami of George Sand, of Louise Colet, and another very beautiful literary woman, who ran away from school in 1848, with the chaplain, to marry him. She afterwards got Jules Favre to plead that there was no marriage, because the Concordat admitted the rule of ecclesiastical celibacy. There were a few others who shone in society. Ste. Beuve quarrelled with them all. They were too refined for him, and he feared to shock them. The Princess returned, but as a lay Sister of Charity. He was never in love with any of them.

Ste. Beuve was a sandy-haired man, with a phenomenally thin beard and rather swinish cheeks. He had a pair of small, blue, shrewd, scrutinising eyes, in which there was a deal of mental expression, but no other. Not a gleam of sentiment ever passed over the face. He liked his food, his wine, and an educated female (I won't say woman) as a tête-à-tête in a restaurant. I dare say he would have liked the companionship of an unaffected woman of mind, if he was sure she would let him alone. He delighted in that of George Sand when she was too busy with other men to fall in love with him. Ste. Beuve was an appraiser. He went deep down into motives. There was more than a touch of suspicion in the character. When he knew Victor Hugo, the poet was very keen to win fame and independence. He had married a dowerless girl, who had quickly brought him four children, and who was not loved enough to prevent him loving others. Nobody better understood than Victor Hugo to what a degree the "suggestion" of critics can influence the sale of books. He saw in Ste. Beuve, whose kind of intellect did not make him a rival, a means to fame—for fame did not come at once even to Victor Hugo. He wished to be released from passionate matrimonial love. A sense of justice made him think it right to release his wife. He must have noticed how she and Ste. Beuve seemed to understand each other, and being a just man, he gave her a letter of licence. The correspondence, and the impressions at the time of mutual friends, lead up to this conclusion. Ste. Beuve may not have cared to go on with a flirtation that had no longer the charm of being clandestine. He would have thought that to do so after the letters he had received would be to reduce himself to a cavaliere-servente for the husband's convenience. There could have been no more selfish man. His pleasures were so purely cerebral as to make him not companionable, except with men as clever as himself. He was also a book-worm, and liked a silent, solitary house.

Victor Hugo was not l'ami of Mlle. Juliette at the time of the Ste. Beuve correspondence. But there were already other amies. Mlle. Louise Bertin simply adored him. She was strong-minded, musical, and enthusiastic about "Notre Dame de Paris," which she made the subject of an opera. Her father was the great Bertin, the founder of the Débats. He also could place a nimbus round the poet's head. Louise Bertin never married, though suitors crowded around her. Victor Hugo may have thought of devoting himself to her as an affinity, and in a manner that would cause no scandal, while Ste. Beuve was taking care of Mme. Victor Hugo. I saw Mme. Victor Hugo in Jules Simon's drawing-room. We were there for, perhaps, half an hour before those we called on entered. The whole time she was wrapped up in her thoughts and speaking to herself. She did not notice that I had entered the room. The face, even then, when I knew little of types, struck me as being Irish; the sad, brooding expression was certainly Irish. She was a Breton. I believe that she did not know how to humbug the genius to whom she was bound. Mlle. Juliette did; she swayed him for more than fifty years, and witnessed at his side, in the avenue called after him, his eightieth birthday celebration. On that occasion all Paris came to pile flowers before his house. Juliette predeceased the poet. She died of an internal cancer. The most intensely beautiful work of art I think I ever saw was a small portrait of her by Bastien Lepage, taken just before her death. Not to bother Victor Hugo, she kept her sufferings to herself, until the disease too unpleasantly declared itself for her to hide it any longer. She was sly and artful, but had great qualities.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

PORTLAND-PLACE, dear Lady Betty, is the Paradise of the severely commonplace. It is composed of very large houses, mainly inhabited by very little people. This week the attention of the world has, however, been directed upon Portland-place, for it was discovered that the members of the Chinese Embassy had kidnapped and were detaining a certain Sun Yat Sen. In the street, Dr. James Cantlie, the friend of the captive Chinaman, was singing, with Wordsworth, "All things that love the Sun are out of doors." In the Embassy the Ambassador was repeating to himself the words of Himmelszelt: "Even though the cloud veils it, the Sun is ever in the canopy of heaven." The latter line very poetically describes the position of the unfortunate Sun, for he was being detained under lock and key in the garret!

"Solem quis dicere falsum audeat?" asked Virgil, which, translated, means:—"Who dares call the Sun a liar?" After many centuries the question has at last been answered, for Sir Halliday Macartney emphatically declares that the account given by Sun Yat Sen of his capture is altogether false! Sun has been released, however, and the curtain has fallen upon the comedy.

To approximately match this incident it is necessary to go far back into history. Christina of Sweden in 1657, when staying at Fontainebleau, seized Monaldeschi, her equerry and lover, and had him beheaded. Cardinal Mazarin, who was then in power, objected very strongly to the proceeding, but as Christina had cut the head of the unfortunate man off, no useful purpose was to be gained by discussing the merits of the matter.

Much nonsense has been published in the newspapers with regard to the privileges enjoyed by Ambassadors and Ministers and their suites. According to international law only the members of an Embassy or of a Legation enjoy these privileges, but this concession does not in any way permit them to ignore the laws of the country to which they are accredited. A foreign diplomatist when at his post cannot be touched by the law which governs the people of the particular country to which he is accredited. This privilege, however, does not permit him to commit breaches of the law. The Chinese Ambassador had no right whatever, according to international law, to detain the person of Sun Yat Sen. It has been argued that Sir Philip Currie, our Ambassador at Constantinople, did much the same thing when he recently gave his protection to a Turk whom the Sultan wished to arrest. In Turkey, however, the Powers have certain rights of jurisdiction, called "Les Capitulations," which they do not possess in other countries. The action of the German authorities in Zanzibar a few weeks ago has also been quoted as a precedent. Zanzibar, it must be remembered, however, is a semi-savage place, which is practically a no-man's land as yet. Besides, there is no doubt that the Germans did not act within their rights upon that occasion, but the matter was of such small importance that it was unnecessary to press the point.

Sir Halliday Macartney has had some curious experiences during the time that he has been attached to the Chinese Legation in London. One day, when the war between China and Japan was at its height, an inventor called at Portland-place. The visitor had a marvellous compound which he declared would at once destroy the Chinese Army, and his only reason for proposing to sell the secret to Sir Halliday was that he was an enthusiastic supporter of the Japanese. Having been informed that, under these circumstances, it was a pity that he had called at the Chinese Legation instead of at the Japanese Legation, the inventor departed with many excuses.

A week later, however, he returned. Since his last interview, it appeared, he had diligently studied the merits of the dispute between the two nations, and his sympathies had, in consequence of the additional knowledge of the facts which he had thus acquired, been transferred to the Chinese! Would Sir Halliday Macartney purchase the secret of the compound? The secret has not been sold yet.

The Royal Academicians will meet on November the 4th to elect a President to succeed the late Sir John Millais.

The Winter Exhibition at Burlington House will probably consist entirely, or almost entirely, of pictures and sketches by the late Lord Leighton. Many persons interested in art have written to the authorities at Burlington House suggesting that the works of the late Sir John Millais and the late Mr. Richmond should be exhibited at the same time. There are several objections to this proposal. First, the pictures and sketches by Lord Leighton, it is considered, will fill the space usually utilised for the Winter Exhibition. In the second place, it might give an opening to undesirable criticism were the works of these artists, who have died so recently, exhibited side by side.

The English world of art has suffered severely during the past few months. No fewer than six of our foremost artists have died during that period—to wit, Lord Leighton, Sir John Millais, Mr. Richmond, Mr. Armitage, Mr. du Maurier, and Mr. William Morris.

Two magnificent pictures—one by Sir Thomas Lawrence, the other by Constable—are to be disposed of on Thursday, when Mr. Henry Lumley will sell by auction the contents of No. 2, Great Stanhope-street, May Fair. The first is a three-quarter length portrait of the beautiful Miss Clements, the second a "Dedham Vale."

The promoters of the Bachelors' Club, the most successful venture of its kind of this generation, originated the system of inviting members to join the club at the time that it was being formed. This innovation succeeded admirably. The committee of the Piccadilly Club decided some months ago to extend their premises, and taking the system adopted by the promoters of the Bachelors' as their pattern, invited a small number of well-known men to offer themselves as candidates for election. Three-fourths of these accepted the offer! This again proves that new departures in the management of club matters succeed which a quarter of a century ago would probably have failed. A new generation has developed new circumstances, and these require new treatment.

The unexpected magnitude of the enthusiasm which the celebration of Trafalgar Day evoked should make it certain that the recently founded "Navy Employment Agency" will meet with general support. The Agency has been formed for the purpose of finding employment for discharged seamen and others of the Royal Navy of unquestionably good character, and to bring employers of labour in touch with a means of finding men admirably fitted for situations of trust. It is managed by a committee of the Castaways' Club, which is composed entirely of executive officers who have resigned their commissions in the Royal Navy. The office of the Agency is at 9, Craig's-court, Whitehall.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

SPORTING NOTES.

I SEE that Laveno is mentioned as likely to win one of the "back-end" handicaps. Mr. Houldsworth's colt did badly at Newmarket the other day in a trial with Coylton, who won easily, and that the "form" of the gallop was contemptible is proved by the fact that the three-year-old ran nowhere for the Gatwick Handicap last Wednesday, although he had a very light weight to carry. In the aforesaid trial Ortolo was beaten off, and he is evidently a very bad colt, and was a pretty sort of beast for people to include among the promising Derby outsiders.

It has been necessary to stop Roquebrune in her work again, and I hear that Sir James Miller will probably send her to the stud. She might very likely have won the One Thousand and Oaks if she had gone on all right, but it may be hoped that the comparative failure of her Turf career will be compensated for by some successes at the stud, where she ought certainly to do well, considering her grand "running" pedigree, by St. Simon out of St. Marguerite.

Mr. Phillips has removed his breeding-stud from Leybourne Grange to Myton, the late Major Stapylton's place in Yorkshire. Kent seems to be quite played out as a horse-breeding county. Great things were formerly accomplished by the late Lord Falmouth at Mereworth, and by Sir Joseph Hawley at Leybourne; but of late years no winners of any note have come from either place. The present Lord Falmouth's stud has, indeed, proved a complete and ignominious failure, although neither money nor trouble has been spared to obtain success. Mr. Phillips would have acted more wisely if he had got rid of his present stud altogether, and then started afresh with a new lot of mares.

The entry for the Champion Stakes at Newmarket (1898), which race closed last week, ought to be studied carefully, as valuable hints may be gathered from it as to the prospects of the present lot of three-year-olds and two-year-olds. Persimmon is not entered, and indeed the only three-year-olds in the list are Bay Ronald, Macbriar, and the American colt, Diakka. Among the two-year-olds are Velasquez, Galtee More, Crestfallen, Minstrel, Brigg, Kilkerran, and the American filly, Sandia. There are fifty entries, and thirty-six of the animals engaged are yearlings. One of them is Mr. L. de Rothschild's Isabina, own sister to St. Frusquin. As to £1,000 being "added" to the race, as is audaciously announced, no less a sum than £750 is got back at once in entrances!

Red Heart has been a persistently written-up candidate for the Cambridgeshire, but I pointed out weeks ago that this horse had been doing no work for a long time, and that he could not possibly be got fit in time to have any chance of winning at Newmarket. A number of people, however, have continued to recommend him, being apparently perfectly infatuated on the subject. He was galloped on Thursday at Newmarket over the Limekilns mile, and he was badly beaten before half the course had been traversed. Red Heart, as I long ago stated, is desperately groggy, and after his ignominious exhibition in this trial it is highly improbable that he will ever win back the outrageously extravagant sum (5,100 gs.) which was paid for him last summer at the sale of Colonel North's stud.

The Duke of Westminster's Orelio, the dark brother to Ormonde, was beaten in his trial at Kingsclere last week, and he can have no chance for the Dewhurst Plate. Orelio wants time, and I should fancy that his début will be postponed until next season. This colt is very heavily engaged as a three-year-old, and besides being entered for all the classic stakes, he is in the various £10,000 races, in which he would have a considerable advantage in the weights with the best animals of both ages.

Another dark two-year-old which did badly in a trial last week was Catherine Luther, the 3,900 gs. filly by St. Simon out of Heresy. She is a racing-like animal, but is never likely to distinguish herself much on the Turf.

The Tuesday after the Houghton Meeting is an important nomination day, and nearly thirty events at Newmarket will then close and name, including the Middle Park Plate and the Dewhurst Plate for next year, and the Two Thousand Guineas and the One Thousand for 1898. It is really quite exasperating to find that the Newmarket authorities are still content to puddle along fatuously with the same utterly idiotic and calf-headed pecuniary conditions for all their races. If they were not obstinately regardless of the signs of the times they would surely recognise the urgent necessity for root and branch alterations in the conditions of such events as the Middle Park Plate. How can owners be attracted by a stake of £30 each, £20 forfeit, with an entrance of £5, which entrance, of course, makes up the £500 which is nominally added? Here we have an immediate liability of £25 on each nomination. The £5,000 stake at Sandown Park costs only £43 for a starter, and by declaring forfeit less than four months before the race is run an owner can get out for £22. The Middle Park Plate has been greatly injured by the far more popular £3,000 stake at Kempton Park, which is run a week before the Newmarket event, but why do not the Jockey Club make their race a subscription event of £5,000, to enter as foals, and let them change the Dewhurst Plate into a Produce Stake of £5,000 on the lines of the Sandown Park race. It is absurd that this week's event should continue to be known as the Dewhurst Plate, a name for which there is not a particle of justification, as there is no affinity with reason in thus commemorating the turbid career of Mr. Gee's long since forgotten stud. Why not call it the Peel Plate or the Falmouth Plate? The Two Thousand and One Thousand are kept on as sweepstakes of £100 each, half forfeit. Why cannot the Jockey Club convert the Two Thousand into a subscription stake of, say, £8,000; and, in the event of any deficiency, they could economise by abolishing the manifestly superfluous Newmarket Stakes, an event which ought never to have been started, and it has since been a regular drain on the fund, without any compensating advantage whatever.

The Champagne Stakes at Doncaster closes this week, with the same miserably parsimonious conditions, as the minor forfeit is still grabbed for the fund. What, however, is quite extraordinary is the limpet-like pertinacity with which the managers of the meeting stick to their insane arrangement of not having any penalties for winners, the result of which foolery was that at this year's meeting the once great race dwindled down to an uninteresting match. If Velasquez had carried 10 lb. extra for his Ascot and Goodwood victories there would, no doubt, have been a dozen starters, but owners were naturally shy of meeting Lord Rosebery's colt at even weights.

A weekly journal announces that "for next year" the Prince of Wales has a brother to Persimmon, named Sandringham, "of whom great things are expected." If the writer of the rubbish had taken any pains to ascertain the truth on the subject he would have discovered that Sandringham is a foal, so that he cannot run for eighteen months to come, at the very earliest. "For next year" the Prince has a half-brother (now two-year-old), by Donovan, to Persimmon, who is a failure, and a half-sister to Persimmon, by Surefoot (now yearling). The same romancing paper states that Lord Rosebery has "in store" for next year's Derby and Oaks a brother to Sir Visto and a sister to Ladas. No such animals are in existence. Velasquez is half-brother to Sir Visto, by Donovan, while Chelandry is half-sister to Ladas, by Goldfinch.

There was a magnificent finish for the Sandown Foal Stakes of £2,000, there being five heads between the leading lot, and as they all swept past the judge, apparently in a line, it seemed impossible that he could separate them. Lord Hervey, who had been reserved for this race, started favourite, but ran very badly. Gulistan, who was perhaps short of work, was just beaten by Chiselhampton, to whom he was giving 17 lb., and behind them came Conroy, who had 21 lb. the worst of the weights with the winner. Red Heart won this race last year, and what a certainty it would have been on this occasion for either St. Frusquin or Galeazzo if they had kept right! The winner is owned by Lord Stanley, but he was entered by his breeder, Mr. J. S. Harrison, who gets £250 out of the stakes.

The official Free Handicap for two-year-olds, which race is run on Friday, is a most fantastical production. Galtee More is estimated to be 2 lb. the superior of Velasquez, and it would be interesting to learn by what principle the individual who framed these weights has been guided. A fortnight ago Velasquez would certainly have been placed 10 lb. above Galtee More, who, however, beat Lord Rosebery's colt in the Middle Park Plate by six lengths! Under these circumstances, it is palpably preposterous to pretend to make out that there is 2 lb. between the pair! The handicapper has got into worse shoals and quicksands by his treatment of Wreath Or, who is placed 8 lb. above Flying Colours. On the day these weights were published Flying Colours gave 27 lb. to Wreath Or at Sandown Park, and beat him very easily. There is a mistake of considerably over two stone in the handicapper's calculations. Not less flagrantly absurd is his treatment of Lord Londonderry's smart colt Cyrenian, who is thrown in with 7 st. 1 lb. Surely this animal's form at Newmarket must have been overlooked. Simola is made to receive 7 lb. from Simoon, but it was clearly apparent to all beholders that at Newmarket the other day she could have defeated the Duke of Westminster's filly had she been disposed to do her best, and they were then running at even weights. This handicap is altogether a most slovenly piece of work. It ought to be a good thing for Cyrenian if he runs, and he has no other engagement this week. The Heath House stable has another leniently treated candidate in the Duke of Portland's Lady Frivoles, who did well in a trial last week.

To-morrow at Newmarket the Free Handicap Sweepstakes, which will be one of the richest races of the week, should be won by Bay Ronald or Jolly Boat. The Dewhurst Plate looks good for Berzak, as he will outstay Goletta over this course. The Duke of Westminster will run Simoon, but it is to be feared that she is no flyer.

On Friday Laodamia ought to be able to defeat Canterbury Pilgrim for the Jockey Club Cup. If, however, Major Egerton's estimate of the pair is correct, Lord Derby's mare will win, as she will have a stone the best of the weights, whereas in the Cambridgeshire Laodamia has to give the Oaks winner only 8 lb. If these mares should be the worse for their exertions this afternoon, then Lord Zetland can win with Jolly Boat, and it is certain that she can stay the course. In any case, the Jockey Club Cup will be a much more interesting race than usual. During the last twelve years there have been three walks over, and on the other nine occasions there were only twenty-four starters altogether. There ought to be penalties and allowances in this event. It would have been a practical walk over for St. Frusquin on Friday if he had kept on his legs. There is a very good entry for the All Aged Stakes, and Grig or Kilcock ought to win. Falkland may win the Houghton Stakes, in the absence of anything smart from the dark lot. The Old Cambridgeshire Handicap has obtained forty-four acceptances, and I shall plump for Ghislaine, as this event ought to be a good thing for the French mare if she goes for it.

Lord Lonsdale intends to resign the Mastership of the Quorn Hunt in April next. He complains, not only that the subscription is altogether inadequate, but also that some subscriptions which have been promised are never paid, and this is certainly an intolerable state of affairs.

The Southern Counties Amateur Swimming Association has committed an act which reveals its methods in a singularly chaste and honourable manner. The blatant legislators of the A.S.A. are for ever telling us that the object of the Association is to teach swimming to all classes, from lords to gutter children, as well as to control amateur sport. Anybody who had not water on the brain would not fail to see that the two objects were bound to come into antagonism. For instance it was palpably absurd to hold amateur competitions amongst poor board school children, and to expect to excite enthusiasm by such means amongst that class of learners. Last week was fixed for the seventh annual Victoria meeting to be held at Peckham. The promoters of these meetings are interested in giving free swimming to board school children, who do not receive money but clothes by way of prizes, while amateurs have other events for themselves. For six years have these meetings been held. The seventh was duly advertised at the Peckham baths, a lengthy programme published, and all arrangements made as on previous occasions. Within eight hours of the time actually fixed for the commencement of the competition, the Southern Committee of the A.S.A. forbade the meeting, because the Association's permit had not been obtained. In other words, those who were working for these poor board school children had not paid the requisite fees to the A.S.A. In previous years no permit had been required. If there was to be any change, surely the hon. sec. of the A.S.A., Mr. Pragnell, who so often tells me by post of his extraordinary and superhuman exertions to get a swimming bath for London, or some other authority, could have taken care to inform the organisers of the meeting that they must get a permit, instead of acting as the Association did, and successfully stopping the meeting at the last moment. To call the action mean, unsportsmanlike, and despicable is to put one's opinion mildly. These precious Associations seem to think they have nothing to do but to show their omnipotence in the most disagreeable way possible. Whether they act in the interests of sport, or to gratify a personal pique, is utterly immaterial. The school children were done out of their treat, and the honour of the Association was saved. A fine notion these children will have of this sportsmanlike Association. It would have been just as well, and, indeed, far better for the best interests of swimming, if the meeting had gone through, and the prohibition had been consigned to the waste-paper basket.

Last week I stated that the Southwark Harriers had been admitted to the Southern Counties Cross-Country Association. Previously they had been excluded because they practised within four miles of Charing Cross. Their admission is conditional on their runs being confined to certain streets. This was, no doubt, done to save the dignity of the Association in admitting the winners of the South of the Thames Championship, which was run over a genuine cross-country course last year. At the same time I should not be content if I were connected with the Southwark Harriers, unless absolute freedom were granted. The police are able to look after the streets without the interference of the Association, which might just as well regulate the length of a man's stride as the place where he should train. At the present time the neighbourhoods of Piccadilly-circus and the Strand offer facilities for cross-country practice which no other town in England can give. One cannot cross a street without jumping a dyke or wallowing through mire. These are the delights of the cross-country athlete, and it is flying in the face of the vestries for any cross-country association to boycott these eligible districts.

Oxford has not such an influx of good oarsmen as in recent years, but Tinné and Warre are quite good enough names. For the fours there are practically only two crews, New and Magdalen, in which latter crew Gold, being the only capable steerer has to row two, and Carr is stroking. The crew goes very well, as also do the holders, New, with all last year's crew. As to the prospects of the University crew, all last year's Blues but Sherwood are in residence. At Cambridge the Hall four is going fairly well, but Fernie's stroke is scarcely lively enough. Adie, the late senior wrangler, and now fellow of Trinity, finds quite enough to do in stroking a crew of Anaks who move slowly over the face of the waters. Third are not well together, Guinness having been away through ill-health, and stroke rather upsets the crew by suddenly putting in half a dozen more strokes than he has rowed the previous minute. A well-known rowing editor is almost in hysterics over college oarsmen competing in coast regattas, and he triumphantly points out that to get a voucher on a tradesman for a prize is illegal under A.A.A. and A.R.A. rules. He will be shocked to learn that at Cambridge, for all sports except the University and Freshmen's sports, and also for College rowing prizes, vouchers are given. He will be still more horrified to learn that it is only within the last eight or nine years that rowing prizes in test tubs and the like have ceased to be paid over in cash.

Middlesex Hospital have every reason to be satisfied with their decision not to scratch their matches. Their forwards played a really good old-fashioned game against Ealing. The two teams in the tight were nearly equal. But the hospital men shoved well, broke up the scrimmages, and carried the ball before them with sharp rushes and dribbles. Their outsides were worth nothing, and the forwards—of whom Baker and Whiteside were the best—not only saved, but won the game, for the Ealing forwards can only play the heeling-out, scratchy game, and a fair lot of three-quarters were quite upset when they found a real rushing forward game being played. Now to turn to bigger events. The result of the match between Oxford University and the London Scottish was a great surprise. The latter team has not shown anything like such good form this season. The weather made the ground a forwards' day, and the Scotch forwards, lead once more by MacMillan, the old International, played in finer style than they have done for the last twelve months. They had all the best of the earlier part of the play and Campbell was within an ace of scoring. The University pack was very disappointing, as they had managed to give a fair show against Cooper's Hill whose forwards are very fine but outsides weak. The defence of the Scotchmen was very good. Cambridge have started by running up huge scores against Guys and the Harlequins. The pace of the University outsides was too great for the visitors, Mackie scoring three times. On paper the Light Blues must be a very hot team, for the Harlequins have been doing very well in town, while Guys have given the Old Leysians a bad beating. By the way, the University has now its own football ground, and subscriptions are wanted from old Association and Rugby blues to pay off the heavy charges. The weather prevented any really good outside play between Moseley and Blackheath, and it is to be hoped that the forward work of the Heathens will improve.

If the London Football Association has forbidden clubs affiliated under its rule to play clubs that do not belong to that body it has been guilty of a suicidal policy, which is only paralleled by the threat of the Football Association to force the first-named organisation to recognise professionalism. It was a great pity that the ground was in such a bad state at the Queen's Club for the match between the Corinthians and St. Bernards. The former on a fast ground would have given any team a good game. As it was, towards the finish the men were played out, and so the Scotchmen won, although they had frequently to kick out of touch to prevent the attack succeeding. The Caledonians had bad luck in losing a man against Cambridge. They were badly beaten, but the game was very fast, and the crowd was delighted when Murison deposited the University goal-keeper Lawrence and the ball in the net at the same time. Burnup played a good game, but the University defence wants strengthening.

The Hurlingham Polo Committee have drafted a set of rules which are rather comical. The great trouble is the height of ponies which was limited to 14 hands until this year. This rule was so diligently observed in the breach that the limit was raised to 14·2. By these rules the limit is to be 14·2 and all ponies are to be registered, but, and this is the ridiculous part of the rule, all ponies that have played in the champion, Inter-regimental, County Club and other important tournaments are to be registered without measurement. Those who have disobeyed the law are therefore carefully exempt from any penalty and can continue to ride horses of 15 hands.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—The hope which I expressed last week, that after the very severe shake-out which had taken place the markets would improve generally, has to some extent been borne out by last week's events. First and foremost, it is a satisfactory feature that the nervousness with regard to dear money has disappeared, and that even the rise in the Bank rate to 4 per cent., instead of causing a relapse, actually stimulated a moderate recovery.

Improving Markets and Four per Cent.

Apparently the public are becoming used to the higher Bank rate, and when the advance was announced some of the "Bear" operators bought back, as they, no doubt, came to the conclusion that dear money had been worked for all it was worth. Home Railway stocks have displayed a remarkably firm tone, and generally mark advances for the week, notwithstanding the unsettled state of the weather. The fact is that there are distinct indications of an improvement in trade, while advices with reference to the iron and steel and shipbuilding industries in the North are most favourable. The fall in gilt-edged stocks has been arrested, and it looks almost as if the present were a good opportunity for investors who wish to place their money with complete safety to get in, as, after all, present quotations of such securities are lower than they have been for some years. The course of the Money Market in the near future still depends upon the extent of gold shipments to the United States, but the impression is gaining ground that there will probably be a pause in this movement, as gold now despatched cannot reach New York until after the Presidential elections take place on November 3. Momentous issues are at stake in connection with the choice of the future President, touching European interests almost as much as American; but, whatever be the result, an end will be put to the present period of uncertainty. A fresh rise has been established in American Rails, which would make further progress if Mr. McKinley were to be elected with an overwhelming majority. Even in that case, however, we need hardly look for any further large gold shipments from this side, as considerable sums of the precious metal, which are at present being hoarded in the States, would be released, and large shipments of European manufactures would be hurried forward for the purpose of evading the Protectionist tariff which a McKinley Government would have to introduce. Should by any chance the Silverites triumph, gold would probably at once return to this country until Mr. Bryan's silver experiment had been proved the disastrous failure which every well-informed financial authority is predicting. The European Money Markets under these circumstances have a brighter future before them, and it is not improbable that a 4 per cent. Bank rate will suffice to protect our reserves, while it is quite on the cards that circumstances will arise which may bring about a reduction before the end of the year. Foreigners have experienced a series of spasms during the past week, especially Spanish and Turks, but these stocks are subject to special influences just now, and holdings of English investors are comparatively small. South Americans have rallied; but the most important feature was a distinct improvement in the Kaffir Circus, in which the wholesale realisations have at last come to an end, and good buying has been noticeable at various times. The settlement is causing a temporary suspension of such purchases, but there seems to be every prospect that the improvement will make progress in the new account. West Australians have been subjected to determined "Bear" attacks; but with the receipt of crushings from the hundreds of new batteries which are now being erected this market will no doubt experience a strong revival. Industrial ventures of proved standing continue to find favour with the investing public, and the issue of the Swift Cycle

Company, Limited, which is being made under Mr. E. T. Hooley's auspices, will be followed at the commencement of November by the same gentleman's new Bovril flotation. Cycle shares generally are distinctly in the ascendant, and with good reason, as the next cycling season is expected to be a brilliant one, there being, so far, not the slightest indication that the popularity of the cycle is on the wane.

Rally in Home Rails.

What I have anticipated for some time is at last coming about. Realisations of Home Railway stocks have come to an end, the speculative account is reduced to a minimum, and a strong rally is in progress; and all this notwithstanding the wretched weather conditions. There are, of course, several favourable influences. To begin with, traffics are on a large scale, and distinctly point to continued improvement in trade, the returns even for last week, which was especially favoured by the attentions of Jupiter Pluvius, showing an increase of £15,000; while for the sixteen weeks of the current half-year an increase of £722,000 is shown. The prosperity of the shipping trade, the rise in freights, the advance in iron and steel, and the booking of further large orders by the shipbuilding yards, are all circumstances which point to greater prosperity in the near future; and now we have also most optimistic reports from Scotland, which have been accompanied by buying orders from Glasgow of the Scotch Deferred stocks. It is obvious that there is a very large margin for a rise in these. Notwithstanding the recent advance, Caledonian Deferred Ordinary (Coras) only stand at 57⅝, as against the highest price of 64½ which has been touched during the present year. North British Deferred at 45⅜ compare with a price of 53⅝, the highest of 1896. Yet both Companies have fulfilled all reasonable expectations, and for the twelve weeks of the present financial half-year the North British has an increase of £23,836, the Caledonian one of £18,652, to show over the very large figures of 1895. Coras have received a dividend at the rate of 2 per cent. for the first half of the financial year, and will probably get 2½ per cent. for the second half, if not more, on which basis they pay upwards of 4 per cent. per annum. The Heavies have also braced up, quotations for the week being from one to three points higher; and there has also been a recovery in Brighton "A" and Dover "A" to 176 and 100¾ respectively. The latter price is, however, still exceedingly low for Dover "A," considering the excellent traffics, which show a total gross increase of £11,498, the last weekly increase having been as much as £1,254. Great Eastern have moved slowly at about 102½. I wonder, by the way, whether Lord Claud Hamilton (the Chairman of the Great Eastern) will succeed in coaxing the shareholders of the London and Blackwall Railway Company into adopting his view, that they should exchange into Great Eastern Four per Cent. Debenture stock, or, if preferred, into a new Three per Cent. Rent-Charge stock? Personally, I do not see why this exchange should not be made, and I should like to know the reason why the Board of the London and Blackwall Company, or Mr. F. W. Haigh, its Chairman, refused to entertain the proposal. Metropolitan Districts have been a quiet market, the group who have control of this stock having rested on their oars, pending some important developments which are at hand. The "Bear" attack which has just been made can only have a temporary effect, as the prospects of the new deep-level scheme are exceedingly promising. Sir Benjamin Baker has reported very favourably. Not only are there no engineering difficulties to be surmounted, but he suggests that the line should be constructed on a gradient between Gloucester-road and Earl's Court, so as to run at the latter station on a level with the existing District line. This will enable the present traffic from Wimbledon, Richmond, Ealing, &c., to run through, only necessitating a change of engines at or outside Earl's Court-station, and of course means that a large number of trains tapping other lines can be run through to join the new express service. It is calculated that, under these circumstances, the new line will more than double the present capacity of the Company. A meeting is to be held at an early date for authorising the necessary preliminary steps.

Yankee Rails—McKinley or Bryan?

I shall not be able to address you again, Ben, before the Presidential elections in the States are over, and I am not therefore going to prophesy so close to the actual event, which takes place on Tuesday, November 3. It is, however, a satisfaction to me that I have so far guided you successfully, and that I was justified in taking the favourable view I did a month or two ago, by following which you have been able to benefit through a very important advance in American Rails. I am still hopeful as regards McKinley's victory; but after the important rise in quotations, and in view of the uncertainty which must obviously remain to the last, I should think that it will now be advisable to go slowly. After all, the news which we receive by cable from New York is somewhat biassed, as not only the Cable Companies, but most of the newspapers in the eastern States, are under the control of the sound-money men. I am not exactly afraid that Mr. McKinley will be defeated, but he may not be elected with that large majority, without which it will be very difficult to break the power of the Silverites in Congress; and it will, moreover, be necessary to introduce some sound financial reforms in addition to retaining the gold basis. That the Silver men are making desperate efforts to get in Bryan is undoubted. By the way, I have received a pamphlet entitled "Elementary Facts bearing on the Silver Question, with Suggestions as to their Present Significance," published in Denver, Col., which is accompanied by a line "From an Englishwoman, who has lived many years in Colorado, during which time she has been a constant reader of Truth." She suggests that this pamphlet may be of some interest, "and thinks that it certainly contains much that would make the writer of the articles on the above question more tolerant of the other side." The pamphlet which my countrywoman sends is a digest of the well-known Silver heresies prepared for consumption by the working-men; and I am sorry to tell the lady that it is not such as to convince any one that the Silver basis would be advantageous for the United States. The triumph of Silver would mean disaster for the Americans in the first instance, and would eventually bring about a great financial crisis in the States. For this country it would mean considerable losses to investors in American securities, and the effects of a convulsion in a country with which we are closely connected by trade and kinship would be unfortunate; but the blow would chiefly be struck at the best interests of the United States. English capital would be withdrawn from that country, and gold would be returning to this side. I do not, however, wish to speculate on events which I hope will not come about. The advance in breadstuffs has certainly been a most powerful ally for Mr. McKinley, and is making converts of the farmers, whose politics are chiefly guided by their pockets. The great rise in wheat has been of enormous importance to the United States, and is really to a considerable extent responsible for the recent gold shipments from this side. Some rather curious arguments are being published on the other side with reference to cotton. Some far-seeing stock operators are stated to be reducing their lines of stocks in anticipation of a dull and narrow market for some time to come, and have gone into cotton, which they believe will now become active and advance. Apart from the strong statistical position of the staple these believers in higher prices base their operations on the outcome of the Presidential election. Their argument is that no matter who is chosen, cotton will go higher. Should McKinley be victorious the result will be general business activity, if not a boom. This will naturally have the effect of increasing the demand for cotton goods, which in turn will start in motion every spindle in the country, and, as mills are not over well supplied, prices will appreciate. In the event of Bryan's election, the advance in the premium on gold, which every one looks for, is bound to cause cotton to rise, as that staple is influenced more by the demand for gold than any other American product—in fact, it is called a gold staple. Some very sanguine Yankee prophets, in fact, predict that cotton, in the event of Bryan's election, will jump 3 cents a pound. The publication of the annual report of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company disposes of all the adverse rumours which have been current regarding its financial condition, and which I emphatically contradicted at the time. Louisville and Milwaukee have led the recent upward movement, and will probably be the most active stocks after the Presidential elections. Atchison stocks have also come to the front, especially the Prefs. By the way, complications have arisen owing to the non-issuing of Atchison common stock. The by-laws of the Company provide that the Directors shall be elected to serve for different periods, so that there will never be a complete change in the directorate at one time, one-third of the number to be elected for one year, one-third for two years, and one-third for three years. The present Board of Directors was elected by the Reorganisation Committee to serve for one year. It was proposed to elect Directors according to the new by-laws at the annual meeting of the Company, to be held at Topeka, December 10, but the delay in issuing the common stock will prevent this, and in consequence a special meeting of stockholders will be called in advance of the annual meeting to amend the by-laws, so that the present Board of Directors will be re-elected to serve for one year, the division of the Board to be into three classes, to be made next year instead of this year. As the common stock of the road cannot be issued, owing to the Atlantic and Pacific injunction, it cannot be voted by the stockholders who really own it. The Reorganisation Committee who still control the present common stock could vote it, but consider that it would be assuming too much responsibility to elect Directors for three years; hence the plan to lay the matter over for one year. American Railroad bonds have been a quiet market, and no particular improvement is expected until the elections are over. The explanation is simple enough. People who hold uninvested funds, which they wish to place into gilt-edged stocks, would obviously await the upshot of the elections, as they would only consider bonds quite safe in case Mr. McKinley were elected. Then, again, after election it is safe to predict that money can be invested to a much better advantage. Although a few forced issues still are coming out, it is not until next month that any great movement is expected in this line. Then, without question, many millions of dollars' worth of choice securities will be issued, which will make a much better variety for the buyer. Canadian Pacifics have recovered slightly, but the last traffic was unsatisfactory, and there is a disposition also in this instance to await the result of the elections. A moderate improvement has occurred in Grand Trunk stocks. The traffic return for the third week of October, showing an increase of £9,936, was not unsatisfactory; but it will be time enough to put up the junior securities when McKinley has been elected.

Foreigners and South Americans.

Amongst interbourse securities interest has chiefly centred in Spanish, which have again fluctuated widely, and after dropping below 57, have recovered to 58. When everything looked very ominous, and the "Bears" were heavily committed, the report was started that a railway loan would be concluded, and that the Banque de Paris had already received back a portion of its last advance, whereupon a sharp rally ensued, followed by a reaction. The financial position in Spain is, of course, as bad as it can be, but I should not be at all surprised if that country were once again helped over the stile, in which case there would be a fine "Bear" squeeze. Turks have declined, which is not surprising, as the latest expedient for raising the wind, viz., an increase of taxation, will probably do more harm than good. South Americans have steadied somewhat, and Argentines have displayed greater strength, although no fresh development with reference to the unification of the debt has to be reported. There is a rumour that an attempt will be made to do something for Buenos Ayres Cedulas, by a conversion in the ratio of three to one into the bonds of the Province bearing Five per cent. interest. It is difficult to see, however, where the money for the service of this new debt would come from. The shrinkage in Brazilians is still going on, and Mexicans are slightly easier. In their case, however, a recovery is practically certain. Uruguay bonds are improving again, the Old Loan being quoted 48⅝, the New Loan 67. Peruvian Corporation stocks are practically unaltered; but amongst the so-called rubbish stocks, Honduras are ¼ lower, notwithstanding the talk about some proposal of the Honduras Government for settling the debt on a low basis. Costa Rica "A" and "B" have fallen two points, and it is disgraceful that the Government of that Republic has not yet purged itself of its default. A satisfactory feature is the renewal of the pooling arrangement between the various Mexican Railways, which has caused a rise of 3 points in the Mexican Railway (Vera Cruz Line) First Prefs. Mexican Central Four per Cent. Gold bonds have also improved a point. It is not surprising that the Mexican Railway has had enough of the rate war, and I have always condemned the rupture of the pooling arrangement. I do not even now understand why Mr. H. Goschen inaugurated his accession to the Chairmanship in this most undesirable manner.

The Kaffir Circus—A Brighter Outlook.

It is a long lane that has no turning, and it was a foregone conclusion that the peristent and indiscriminate sales of South African Mining securities must come to an end somehow. The turning point has now come, and after another shake out, which brought prices almost to the lowest level touched, a sharp improvement has set in, and the very fact that a moderate rally has held in the face of the settlement is of good omen for the new account, in the course of which well-informed authorities anticipate a further marked recovery. With the forced sales by discomfited speculators there have also been contracted very large "Bear" commitments, and sooner or later this position must result in a squeeze. I repeat that the outlook of the mining industry in the Transvaal is very satisfactory. The question of Sunday labour is expected to be solved in a manner favourable to the industry, and nothing is heard any more of the strike of natives. The troubles in Rhodesia are practically over, and the uncertainty with regard to the Chartered Company has been put an end to by the announcement of a new issue of Chartered shares. It is proposed to create one million new shares, but for the present to issue only 500,000, which are to be offered to the shareholders pro rata (one to every five shares) at the price of £2. Three hundred thousand shares are guaranteed at £2, the guarantors receiving the option, in lieu of commission, to take up 150,000 of the reserved shares within a year at 2¾. A meeting of shareholders will be held on November 6. It is understood that a large portion of the money raised will be applied to railway extension. I am not an admirer of the Chartered Company; but speaking from the market point of view I should think that the shareholders will not hesitate to subscribe for their proportion of the guaranteed shares, considering that the present price is 2⅜. The steadying of Chartered shares would doubtless have a favourable effect upon the rest of the market, and even such gambling counters as Rand Mines, Consolidated Goldfields, and East Rands are showing signs of recovery. As a great many "Bear" sales have undoubtedly been effected in these, a temporary rally would not be at all surprising, especially as the East Rand Company has withdrawn for the present the proposed issue of new shares. My readers will, however, do well to confine their purchases to sound Witwatersrand gold mines and well-established land companies, and I have little doubt but that a purchase now made of the following shares will within a month or two yield excellent results:—Langlaagte Estate at 4⅞, New Primrose at 4¾, Glencairn at 2½, City and Suburban at 4⅛, Robinson at 8⅜, Wolhuter at 5¼, Randfontein at 2⅜, New Johannesburg Consols at 2 5/16, Barnato Consols at 2 1/16, Buffelsdoorn at 2¼, Langlaagte Royal at 1 9/16, Henderson's Estates at 2¼, Lydenburg Estates at 1⅜, Oceana Consols at 1 5/16, Mozambique at 1 7/16, Modderfontein "B" at 1¼, Waterfall Estates at ⅝, Woodstock (Transvaal) at 1⅜, and Knights at 5⅜. A selection from this list would at present prices be very promising for a successful operation. I cannot, however, too much impress upon my readers to buy only such shares as they can take up and pay for. Recent events in the Mining Market have shown how dangerous it is to run such shares speculatively. Altogether irrespective of intrinsic values, shrinkages have occasionally to be faced, and those who have paid for their shares will be able to weather the storm, and will eventually not only see their money back, but also make a profit in the end. It is stated that Messrs. Barnato Brothers have now floated the Lindum Gold Mining Company with a capital of £500,000, the properties consisting of 84 claims of the old Lindum Gold Mining Company, 154 claims of the Sexagon Syndicate, the mynpacht (about 130 claims) formerly belonging to the First Netherlands Transvaal Gold Mining Company, and 142 claims of the Chester Van Dyk Syndicate. It is a low grade proposition, and it is claimed that the Horsham Monitor reefs pass through the Lindum properties. The annual report of the Black Reef Proprietary Company is very disappointing, and so far no tangible result has been obtained. The same applies to the results as yet achieved by the Western Molyneux. At the statutory meeting of the Cataract Barberton Gold Mining Company, Limited, satisfactory statements were made by the Chairman, Mr. Edward Rawlings. A shaft is about to be sunk to a depth of 100 ft., and then a cross-cut is to be made to strike the lode. A very satisfactory circumstance is that a considerable sum of money—viz., £20,000—is in hand for working expenses. The property consists of 150 claims, and the outcrops of two well-defined quartz reefs have been traced for a long distance. An important and favourable point, as affecting all the mines in the Klerksdorp district, is the resolution come to also by the Klerksdorp Chamber of Mines to enact the reduction of native wages as already in force in the Witwatersrand district. As this reduction will come into force on November 1, cheaper working is assured from that time. This applies amongst the better-known mines chiefly to the Buffelsdoorn Estate, Palmietfontein, Niekerk, and Africander. The latest performance of the Kaffir Consolidated Investment and Land Company is a circular puffing Bantjes. It would be interesting to know what other business this Kaffir concern is doing. With reference to the Langlaagte Star a good deal of "Bearish" talk has been committed to paper lately; but I warn shareholders not to be influenced by these obviously interested paragraphs. It is quite true that in the western part of the Langlaagte Star property a dyke has been met with, and as it was doubtful to what depth it extended, and it would have taken a longer time to pierce it, the Directors very properly decided upon developing the eastern portion of the mine, in which there is no dyke and the ore is richer, while keeping ten to fifteen stamps running. By December next sufficient better-class ore will have been developed in the eastern portion to again run the whole of the sixty stamps, and it would be the greatest folly for Langlaagte Star shareholders to throw away their shares on the present "Bearish" talk. By the way, the position in Paris has undoubtedly improved, and I have it on very good authority that no further large blocks have to be liquidated. Whatever weakness yet remains in Paris is due to the relapse in Spanish and Turks, our mercurial French neighbours being moved to sell almost everything, when a severe spasm occurs in some of their securities. Once the Paris liquidation of the end of the month is completed, we may look for better things from that quarter. I may mention, moreover, that orders which were sent for large amounts of shares of a certain group during the last few days could not be executed at anything like the present prices; and the brokers entrusted with the orders returned them with the remark that in order to obtain such blocks of shares the limit would have to be raised from ¼ to ½. I understand that the accounts of the Robinson Bank for the year ending September 30 have now been made up, and that the Paris Directors—who have been over here for the purpose—are well satisfied with the same, and with the promptitude with which the accounts have been struck. A meeting will be held in London on November 10, when results will be announced which may, under the circumstances, be considered satisfactory. With reference to the labour question in the Transvaal, too, I have received further encouraging information. The rinderpest has so strong an influence upon native labour that any amount of the latter is now obtainable, and it is anticipated that a further reduction in native wages—on the top of the recent reduction—will be enforced. It may further be stated that, most of the heavy work on the mines having been got over, the cost of white labour will now also be reduced. Thus the mining industry on the Rand is now in a better position than it has been for many years. Diamond shares are also likely to recover with the gold department, and De Beers have already rallied to 28, and New Jagersfontein to 9. Another reconstruction is looming in the distance for the St. Augustine (Diamond) Mine. I have always held a poor opinion of this concern, and the shareholders can now again sing "Oh Du lieber Augustin!"

Golden West Australia.

There is absolutely no reason for the "Bear" attack which has been made on certain West Australian gold mining shares, and I have no doubt that this department will experience a strong rally after the carry over. In this market the speculative account is quite small, the shares being generally taken up and paid for; and the curious fact has been ascertained that, notwithstanding the declines which have taken place in various directions, hardly any shares, or only small amounts, have passed through the transfer offices of the Companies; so that there have not been sales of real stock, but speculative commitments have been entered into by the ursine party, who will, no doubt, in due time have to suffer for their audacity. I showed last week that some of the leading mines are making excellent progress, and as hundreds of batteries are being sent out or are in course of erection in Western Australia, we shall by and by receive such increasing returns of actual crushing that even the greatest unbelievers will be convinced. It is much to be regretted that a daily contemporary, which ought to have known better, viz., the Daily Chronicle, should have given currency to the suggestion put forward by jealous Melbourne papers that the returns of gold of certain West Australian mines is unreliable. The sweeping condemnation indulged in by my contemporary is altogether absurd. The Melbourne Age only mentions one Company, and alleges that of a parcel weighing 400 oz., and telegraphed as such to England, 390 oz. had been discovered to be iron, and only 10 oz. gold, at the Melbourne Mint. My Australian contemporary ought certainly to publish the name of the mine, and the absurdity of accusing all West Australian mines of such practices is fully demonstrated by the fact that the Lake View Consols Company has announced that the August production of gold of 1,508 oz. realised as much as £3,615, or £4. 3s. 9d. per oz. This means that it is nearly pure gold, the price for which is £4. 5s. per oz., and very much finer than the Witwatersrand or other Australian gold. Too much importance need not, however, be attached to the lucubrations of an ignorant or biassed critic. Sensible men are, on the contrary, now realising the great future of the West Australian goldfields; and I am glad to see that the Statist, which has hitherto been in a hesitating frame of mind, is waking up to the magnitude of these fields. In its current issue my contemporary publishes a very useful table of crushings and average returns from each field. I suppose very few people had any idea that the English-owned Companies had this year crushed 133,378 tons of ore for a yield of 337,380 oz. of gold, or an average of 2½ oz. to the ton. This is no trial crushing, and such results are bound to tell in the long run. It is people's ignorance of such facts as these that make them doubtful of the wealth of Western Australia. The following is an extract from a letter, dated September 25, which has just reached me from a man of high position in Western Australia, who is certainly not given to be over-sanguine :—

The opening of the railway to Kalgoorlie marks another forward step in our progress. I was more deeply impressed with this mining centre (if possible) than with Coolgardie, but perhaps this was as much as anything else due to the absolutely different nature of the gold formations which it was my privilege to inspect, Kalgoorlie gold being mainly found in soft decomposed schist, very friable and tender compared with the hard quartzes I saw at Coolgardie. I fear you would think I was exaggerating if I endeavoured to estimate the amount of payable "formation" in sight; but I cannot conceal my conviction that the leading mines cannot possibly be worked out for fifteen to twenty years, and if they improve below the 300 ft. level, or are even maintained at their present productive ratio, who shall estimate their possible period of profitable existence? Great discoveries of water are recently reported, and more will be made as time proceeds under careful scientific search, nevertheless the Government water scheme is at this present juncture wise and prudent from every point of view.

The declines have been pretty well distributed over the whole market, but they are not important, and would be soon wiped out by comparatively small investment purchases. Great Boulder, in fact, are already rallying at about $6\frac{3}{4}$. West Australian Goldfields are quoted at $6\frac{1}{2}$, and West Australian Joint Stock Trust, after reacting, are up again at $2\frac{3}{4}$ premium. A further sharp relapse in West Australian (Gold District) Trading is being slowly recovered, the Ordinary shares being quoted $\frac{1}{2}$, the Founders' shares 17-20. West Australian Exploring and Finance and London and Globe Finance have at one time touched $4\frac{3}{4}$-$\frac{7}{8}$, and have reacted to $4\frac{1}{2}$-$\frac{3}{4}$; but nothing has happened to change the splendid position of these two Companies, which will announce very large profits in December next. With reference to my recommendations of last week, I am glad to notice than an excellent crushing of 193 tons has been announced from the Great Boulder Main Reef. The ore yielded 400 oz. per ton, and 1 oz. 8 dwt. was left in the tailings. If these returns continue, as I am assured they will, the price cannot long remain at the present low figure of $1\frac{1}{16}$. Another recommendation was Robinson Gold Mines, now quoted $\frac{7}{8}$, which I stated would give a good account of itself; and this is confirmed by a cablegram to the effect that a new reef has been cut, and that the mill is running day and night. The mill at Mawson's Reward has also been started, and the fortnightly reports continue very good, the shares standing at $\frac{7}{8}$. White Feather Rewards have held their ground well all through, being quoted $1\frac{15}{16}$, and no one disputes the value of this mine. An attempt was made to bang Mount Margarets, but no liberties were allowed, and I am sure that better prices will be seen in both these mines as soon as the markets generally brace up. Mount Margarets are now quoted $1\frac{3}{8}$. Since I mentioned East Murchison favourably, the highly satisfactory report of the Warden to the Minister of Mines has been published. There appears to be no doubt that this is a good mine and well equipped, although the shares stand at only $\frac{3}{4}$. Hampton Plains are a mystery. Further splendid information was sent out to the shareholders this week, but the effect (which should in ordinary times have put life into the market) was nil. The truth is when people are nervous they will sell something. Presently, however, I have no doubt that it will dawn upon investors that they are allowing a splendid opportunity to slip by in not buying Hampton Plains at this moderate quotation. In addition to the mines just mentioned, Cue No. 1 at $\frac{9}{16}$ also deserve every attention. I have just had a chat with Mr. Charles Kaufman, the consulting engineer of the West Australian Exploring and Finance and London and Globe Finance groups. He was good enough to show me some of the splendid specimens which he has brought home with him, more especially from the Lake View Consols, Mainland Consols, and also from the Wealth of Nations. Mr. Kaufman's enthusiasm with reference to the Lake View Consols is unbounded. He says that there is at present enough rich ore in sight to account for the whole of the capitalisation at the present quotation; and although crushings yield only about 3 oz. to the ton, in the last tailings there were 2 oz. 6 dwt., and he is of opinion that the next tailings will assay even more. The present old 20-stamp battery will, of course, be kept going; but by the time the further new 20-stamp battery is erected, there will be sufficient water to run this also, while it is the intention to eventually put up from eighty to 100 stamps more. Mr. Kaufman reiterates his view that in all his experience he has never met with so splendid a mine as the Lake View Consols, which is the pick of the West Australian goldfields, and the shares in which ought to be worth two or three times the present price of about 7. As regards the Mainland Consols, he is of opinion that with the ten stamps now going it is doing as well as any one could expect; and when the thirty stamps are working he will have sufficient water from the Day Dawn to run these also. The new 20-stamp mill of the Paddington Consols is expected to be complete by the end of the year; and for this, as well as the Hannan's Golden Group and Golden Treasure, he also predicts a very prosperous future. I must confess that the strong and confident views which Mr. Charles Kaufman expressed on the whole of the group of mines referred to have impressed me most favourably, and confirmed me in the opinions I have so frequently put forth, viz., that shareholders should stick to their holdings in anticipations of much higher values.

Indian, New Zealand, and Other Mines.

The Indian gold mining section should be closely watched, especially now that the October crushings are nearly at hand. There has, however, been a moderate decline in some of the leading mines, Mysore being quoted only $8\frac{1}{16}$, Champion Reefs $7\frac{1}{2}$, Coromandel $2\frac{3}{16}$, Nundydroog $3\frac{7}{16}$. The dividend of 2s. per share declared upon the latter is, however, in every respect satisfactory. Goldfields of Mysore are firmer at 21s. 6d. In Australian shares, other than West Australian, Aladdin's Lamp are firm at 3. There has been a decline in Mount Lyell to $7\frac{3}{4}$, and lower prices are also quoted for British Broken Hill and Mount Morgan. The Aladdin's Lamp Mine commences its new year in the same satisfactory manner in which it closed. According to the return just received for the last three weeks, 1,198 oz. of approximate value of £4,400 have been produced, equal to an earning of 5 per cent. for this period. A further dividend of 10 to 15 per cent. will shortly be declared. In Charter Towers shares, Mills's Day Dawn United, New Queen, and Day Dawn P.C. have eased off. Croydon Consols have maintained a firm tone at from 10s. to 10s. 6d., and North Croydon Consols stand at from 3s. 6d. to 4s. In New Zealand mines, a further relapse has taken place in Taitapu, Waihi Silverton, New Zealand Joint Stock, Waitekauri Extended, and a number of others; the only advance being marked in Hauraki and Royal Oak. Towards the last, however, a better feeling has sprung up for New Zealand mines, and advices from that Colony are distinctly encouraging. It is understood that Mr. Cecil Hartridge, who owns a large interest in a number of New Zealand mines, is about to proceed to New Zealand to personally inspect the properties. Thither also Mr. Faithfull Begg, M.P., is wending his way, after having made an exhaustive tour over the West Australian goldfields. I hear that another group connected with New Zealand is about to float the Royal Standard Special Claim in the Hauraki Goldfields, covering an area of 100 acres. This property is stated to be traversed by two very large and important reefs, while another valuable one is being opened up, and other good reefs are expected to be struck. Assays of six sealed samples yielded from 1 oz. 12 dwt. to 9 oz. 9 dwt. per ton. There are also great natural facilities, and a magnificent water right has been acquired. Out of the capital of £200,000 the sum of £55,000 is reserved for working capital, and the issue will be made publicly in the near future. In the general foreign section, Rio Tinto have had their ups and downs again, but are very firm at the last at $24\frac{1}{4}$. Columbian Hydraulic have improved; but De Lamar, Burma Ruby, and Argentine Concessions are lower.

Grand Central (of Mexico) have been steady at 2¼. I am asked to state that Messrs. Atkinson & Dresser, solicitors, 30, Finsbury-circus, London, E.C., having been consulted by one of the shareholders of the United Exploration and Investment Company, Limited, who feels that he has been badly treated, have invited the shareholders to attend a meeting to be held at their offices on Wednesday, the 28th inst., at three o'clock, for the purpose of taking counsel together as to the best course to be adopted for the protection of the interests of those shareholders who are not connected with the promotion of the Company. Advance copies, for private circulation, are being sent out of the Cripple Creek (Bull Hill) Finance and Development Company, Limited, the capital of which is to be £160,000, and which is to be a parent Company. The fact that these prospectuses are being sent out by the Underwriting Bureau, Limited, of which R. B. Oakley is Managing Director, is, however, likely to militate against the success of this concern.

New Enterprises and Issues.

The prospectuses of the following new Companies and issues have been placed before the public during the week:—

Burbank's Main Lode, Limited.—This Company has been formed to acquire and further develop two Mining Leases, known as the "Baby Block" and "Bullara Block," situated at Burbanks, 4½ miles south of Coolgardie, Western Australia. The capital is fixed at £65,000 in shares of £1 each, of which 32,500 shares are set apart to provide working capital.

This property, which is 36 acres in extent, is situated in a proved gold-bearing district. The price paid for it is very moderate, while the provision made for working capital should be ample for the development and working of the mines. The management is placed in the hands of Professor William Nicholas, who has proved himself a capable man, and the prospects point to its becoming a fair mining venture.

The London Woollen Company, Limited.—This Company has been formed to acquire as a going concern the business known as the Wood-street Clothing and Woollen Warehouse, Limited, carried on at Little Love-lane, Wood-street, E.C., and to further develop and extend the same. The capital is £80,000, divided into Six per Cent. Cumulative Preference and Ordinary shares of £1 each.

Norton & Company, Limited.—This Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring and carrying on the business of Norton & Company, furniture manufacturers, cabinet-makers, general furnishers, &c., now carried on by Mr. John Norton in Corporation-street, Cannon-street, and Fore-street, Birmingham. The capital is £100,000, divided into 60,000 Six per Cent. Preference and 40,000 Ordinary shares of £1 each. £10,000 out of the Preference issue will be provided for additional capital.

The Swift Cycle Company, Limited.—This Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring as a going concern the whole of the assets and undertaking known as the Coventry Machinists' Company, Limited, carrying on business at Cheylesmore and Little Park-street, Coventry, and London, with agencies in the principal towns of Europe, Australian continent, India, the Cape, and South America. The capital is £300,000, divided into 100,000 Six and a Half Per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares, and 200,000 Ordinary shares of £1 each. There will also be issued 750 Six Per Cent. Mortgage Debentures of £100 each.

This Company has taken over the business of the Coventry Machinists' Company, Limited, one of the oldest firms in the cycle trade. The trading account for the past year shows a profit of over £50,000, which will admit of a 15 per cent. dividend on the Ordinary shares (after all the Preference and Debenture interest has been paid), and leave a substantial balance to be carried forward. The vendor guarantees a sum of £20,000 as additional working capital, and the assets amount to £131,000, after allowing a large sum for depreciation. The orders at present in hand exceed those of last year by 5,329 machines. I think a business progressing at this rate promises well.

The Universal Medicine Company, Limited.—This Company has been formed to purchase the patent rights and formulas of several patent medicines belonging to the Hawker Medicine Company, of Canada. The capital is £60,000.

This is, in my opinion, an impudent attempt to float a Company to acquire the right to sell what is called a patent medicine, of which little is known in this country. I should like to know also why, if the medicines have made a reputation in Canada under the name of Hawker, the promoters should see any necessity for changing the name. Several of the diseases they profess to cure are already covered by well-known patent medicines that have a very large sale. I cannot see that there is any room for another "Richmond" in the field of cure-all panaceas, especially when he changes his name.

Burgon & Company, Limited.—This Company has been formed to acquire the business of Burgon & Company, Teamen, Grocers, &c., carried on at Leeds and elsewhere. The capital is fixed at £75,000, divided into 7,500 Six per Cent. Cumulative shares of £5 each, and 37,500 Ordinary shares of £1 each.

Yorkshire people are considered, and no doubt are, very canny, and the promoters of this concern probably well know this; but I cannot think they are very wise in asking general investors to subscribe to a venture, the capital of which could be subscribed fifty times over in Leeds alone, if there was anything really good in it.

Yates's Castle Brewery, Limited.—Share capital £250,000 in £10 shares. This Company is an extension of Williams, Yates, & Company, Limited, and the Castle Brewery, Ardwick, Manchester.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

M. I. W., Brighton.—No; I do not advise purchase of Consols (Goschens) yet, and also think that Local Loans may experience a further set back. Secundus.—I look upon the present financial position in Rio de Janeiro as very precarious; but I hardly like to advise you to sell after the heavy fall. Possibly there may be a slight improvement, which will enable you to get out better; but I have for some time been adverse to these bonds. Vido.—I should consider the new Uruguay Five per Cent. Loan, at 67, preferable to the old Loan.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

Brabant.—Had you not better await the result of the American Presidential elections? If these are favourable, you can get more than the return you require in perfectly safe high-class American Railroad bonds. Miss E. H., Ealing.—Your experience is only that which all bondholders in the Provident Association of London have to undergo. The advantages claimed for it by the persons who run the concern are altogether delusive. I have, however, so frequently expressed my opinion on this matter, that if you are a regular reader of TRUTH, you should have steered clear of this "Association." Ardnagros.—All the firms mentioned by you are either syndicate touts, or touts for obtaining subscriptions to various "systems" of gambling at Monte Carlo. Have absolutely nothing to do with them, and read the remarks in last week's issue under the heading "The Tricks of the Syndicate Touts." S. M., Northwich.—I do not care much for the London and Westminster Contract Corporation; you had better stick to one of the strong groups. Miss C. M. H.—I repeat what I have so frequently expressed, that these German lotteries are not actually frauds, but that the money generally sticks to the fingers of the intermediaries, who are extremely shady. F., Newcastle.—1. No; I do not consider this a sound insurance office, and have several times said so. 2. This is a question which you must decide yourself. 3. Ditto. T. S. C.—No; I do not consider that you can depart from the trust deed so far as to obtain a four per cent. yield. Yes, as to the last question. Mansfield.—You cannot obtain this return at present with safety; but the rise in the Bank rate may bring about a further decline in gilt-edged securities.

Home Rails.

P. F.—Stick to your Dover "A" and Coras. They will improve directly the monetary position becomes clearer. Debenture Holder.—I have not spoken unfavourably of this concern, and should advise you to hold the Debentures by all means.

American and Foreign Rails.

Hermes.—A. Central Argentine Ordinary stock was always one of my recommendations when the price was much lower, and I advise you to hold. B. A fair investment, but no catch. Why do you not write to the Secretary of the Buenos Ayres and Ensanada Port Railway, he will furnish you with the traffics. C. A fair investment, but high enough just now. Ruffian.—You should hold your Wabash Debentures now. There is every prospect of a rise in Yankee Rails, and this is not the time to sell. The Argentine stocks Nos. 1 and 2, into which you propose to exchange, are no catch. No. 3 are cheap enough.

Mining Shares.

Candace.—Henderson's Estates is a promising Company, and you should buy more to average. They are now recovering in sympathy with the rest of the market. Arthur.—The first-mentioned shares were quoted 2¼ on that date. There is no option but to hold the other shares. Lex.—I do not like the concern mentioned by you. M. B. B.—The following are the quotations asked for:—1. 1⅛. 2. 1 15/16. 3. 11/16. 4. ⅝. 5. ⅝. 6. 1¼. You should hold all for an improvement. Croydon Consols should be bought at once, as a large dividend will be paid next month. W. G. H.—I am pleased to learn that you have done so well in Croydon Consols. As regards the slump in Kaffirs and Westralians, as you have taken up your shares you can afford to await the recovery which is already in progress. The last-mentioned Company is fairly promising. Aaron.—Amongst the shares mentioned by you I prefer Randfontein (3). Yes, you might average Londonderry. Frisco.—1. No; I do not recommend purchase of the shares of the West Australian Loan and General Finance Corporation. 2. A fair mining risk; but there has been some curious weakness of late, and it would be advisable to wait. 3. No. Star.—No, you had better buy the old shares in the market. Croaker.—Sell on an improvement. Stroud Green.—Amongst your shares Nos. 1 to 9, I like London and Globe Finance (9), Aladdin's Lamp (3), and North Croydon Consols (8) best. The others should, however, also be held for an improvement. G. C., Norwich.—The Buffelsdoorn Gold Mining Company is very promising, and you may safely buy the shares. Birkdale.—1. A further rise in Croydon Consols is looked for. 2. No dividend is as yet in sight, but the shares are likely to improve when the reef is struck; you seem to have got in very high. Alpha.—All your mining shares Nos. 1 to 20 should now be held, as the market generally is improving. Anxious, Llandudno.—Hold all your shares, more especially African Estates and Leicester Diamonds, which are expected to go higher. Patience.—Amongst the shares mentioned by you, I prefer London and Globe (2) and Randfontein (3). Ralph.—They are £1 shares, and a good investment. Dum.—No very recent information, and no catch. You can do better in the West Australian market. Itchiban,—No special reason for this depreciation, and it is understood that a very favourable report is about to be issued. Airdrie.—I do not recommend purchase of these shares. They are low-priced, but not cheap. Sardine.—I am glad to hear that you have upon the whole found my advice very valuable; but I am sure you must have done well in getting out of your Chartered, which are now quoted only 2¼. Your list Nos. 1 to 25 is a good one, and the shares are very well selected, and with the recovery which is now in progress you should reap excellent profits. I should think that Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 18, and 19 could with advantage be averaged, if you could afford to take the shares up and pay for them. Hainault.—I do not think much of Nigel Extension, and the other Company mentioned looks doubtful. Sherwood, Mansfield-road.—I have fully explained the position of Glencairns in previous issues. These, as well as Langlaagte Star, Langlaagte Estate, and Randfontein should be held for a recovery, which is already in progress. Nugget.—As far as I can judge at present, I do not like this new Australian Corporation. M. D., Hailsham.—No, this mine has not declared a dividend owing to the disturbed state of the Transvaal; but at the end of the present period of six months a distribution will no doubt be made. Q. E. D.—After the heavy fall you had better hold these shares. H. A. L.—No option but to hold these shares, and you should buy more to average. This mine will come right again. Ansioso.—Amongst the shares mentioned by you, only No. 5 are tempting. Instead of buying the others, you can do much better in the shares mentioned in my letter under "Golden West Australia." Toby N.—All these Companies are promising, and the meetings will be held at no distant date. Ignoramus, Guernsey.—No option but to hold. With the quelling of the insurrection in Rhodesia a recovery should come about. Anxious One.—Hold African Estates, and buy more to average. St. Fort.—This concern is not of good standing, but Johannesburg Consols are likely to mark a further advance. It is, however, useless to buy Johnnies at 3¾, at which they are guaranteed by Messrs. Barnato, when you can buy them in the market at about 3. As regards your inquiry about the Preference shares, these are obviously safer than the Ordinary shares. Mugwumps.—These shares are very cheap, and should be picked up; the fall was due to the general depression. Wexford Oyster.—1. Keep your East Rands for an improvement, and then sell; but do not average. 2. Randfonteins are a good purchase. 3. Amongst South Africans, you might buy Woodstock (Transvaal), Waterfall Estates, Langlaagte Estates, Johannesburg Consolidated Investment, and Barnato Consols. Dilatory.—It is very difficult to advise on the future course of Consols, which depends upon factors that cannot at present be sufficiently gauged. Your mining shares, Nos. 1 to 3, should be held for a rise, and I still recommend Croydon Consols. Tikoos.—1. I do not think much of Exploring Land and Minerals. 2. Hold for a recovery. 3. Adler's Consolidated is a promising Company. 4. Hold these. 5. I have never been in favour of Bayley's Reward, but hardly advise selling at present price. 6. Not now. Caledon.—Hold all your mining shares Nos. 1 to 5 for a rise. They are well selected, and should reach a much higher level. As regards Nos. 6 to 10, you might put some of the money into No. 8. The others are not promising, and you can do much better by acting on my advice under the "Kaffir Circus" and "Golden West Australia." W. K.—1. As you are a holder keep these for a recovery, which is not improbable. 2. Amongst West Australians, Great Boulder Main Reef 10s. shares fully paid at 13/16, Mawson's Reward £1 shares at 15/16, White Feather Reward £1 shares at 1 15/16, Cue No. 1 £1 shares at 9/16, and Mount Margaret £1 shares at 1½, are an excellent purchase. Deep and Flat.—1. About six months ago. 2. Obviously not yet. 3. In six months. 4. Certainly, Hannan's Golden Treasure is an excellent investment. Mysore.—1. No foundation; the Company is promising and should do well in time. Anxious.—No particular occasion for selling now. A. S. B.—These are adverse comments which cannot be relied upon; you should hold. Nelson.—1. Hold Modderfontein for a rise, and buy more to average. 2. Yes. Nyfnyc.—I do not like the surroundings of this concern, but I do not see how you can resist payment of the calls. Persandum.—1. Take a good profit when you can get it. 2. No. Bay Charmer.—1. This mine is apparently doing well now, and the shares should certainly be held. 2. Hold also Atchison shares, which are recovering again with the rest of the Yankee market. Deposit.—As a general rally is in progress, you should hold your East Rands for a recovery; but it is a great pity that you bought these at so high a price altogether against my advice. Randfontein are still worth buying, and you should hold Nos. 1 to 5. Perplexed, Dover.—No option but to hold these shares, which are likely to further improve. C. H. C.—Randfontein Estates and Johnnies should suit you. A. G. L.—West Australian Exploring and Finance are still a good purchase, and so are the other shares mentioned by you. You might well spread the money over these. Beta.—I still look for a recovery. Braille.—The shares mentioned by you are promising. I cannot tell you yet what the dividend on London and Globe Finance will be, but it will be a good one. M. G. G.—Your shares Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5 are well selected; but I do not like No. 4. Jacobus.—Advices from the Robinson Mines of West Australia are favourable, and you should hold. J. B. B.—1. These West Australian mines should recover. 2. Not yet. 3. Not exactly. Maida.—1. A fair mining risk. 2. I do not think well of these. 3. Neither do I like this concern. Hold Hampton Plains and Grand Centrals. A. D.—1. You had better hold the shares. No option but to keep Nos. 2 to 5, which are well selected. The London and Globe Finance report will be issued in December. Scipio.—No recent information available. M. O.—It is understood that the North White Feather Consolidated Gold Mines is developing favourably, and you should hold the shares; you must, of course, pay the call of 2s. 6d. just made. Nimrod.—No reason to sell now; on the contrary, this is the time when South African shares should be held. I do not care for the W. A. Minerals and Finance Company. Fin.—A. No reason to sell; a recovery is not improbable. B. Amongst the shares Nos. 1 to 6, I consider Preece's Point (1) and Komata Queens (5) the most promising. Sic Donec.—1. It has taken a long time to obtain returns from this mine. 2. You must not expect dividends yet. J.B.—The Company has evidently not been so well managed as it ought to have been. Jub. Con.—You have done right in holding the shares through the slump; they are now in the course of recovery. No reason to sell your various Croydon Mining shares. J.P.—1. You have been wise in not having anything to do with this person. 2. I think you may safely hold Croydon Consols for a further important advance. 3. You had better take your profit on a portion of these shares. 4. You will have to wait a little with regard to these shares, but they are sure to come to the front, and will eventually go to 2 or higher. 5. No reason to sell Wealth of Nations; when the water difficulty has been got over they will rise considerably. 6. I do not think much of these, and have no new information with regard to Nos. 7 and 8. Briar Pipe.—1. Hold the shares for a rise. 2. All these shares should certainly be held for a rise. Surveyor, Clapham.—You are quite right to buy W.A. Exploring and Finance and London and Globe Finance, and I have always said so. H. E. W.—I maintain the view which I have already expressed. Sigma.—There has been a general decline in Nos. 1 to 3; but they should now be held for a recovery. Prosen.—1. No option but to hold for a recovery. 2. Yes, White Feather Reward should be bought to average; this is a very promising mine. S. H., Brixton Hill.—There has been some weakness in this group, which has brought about a relapse in the shares. There seems to be no option but to hold for the present. Mystified.—1. A fair mining risk. 2. I do not like the Jackson Goldfields. 3. No. 4. No. 5. I do not like the Darien Gold Mines at all, and have always said so. 6. I do not care for Bayley's Reward shares, and have never expressed a favourable opinion. Zulu.—You should hold these shares; they will recover again. Kent.—No option but to hold the shares in question; they will recover again. I do not recommend the purchase of Brownhill Great Southern. The report is returned in your envelope. Oulton Low.—1. No option but to hold these South African shares; they should recover again. 2. A fair mining risk, and advices are fairly encouraging. Teddie.—A promising Company; hold. The shares have fallen in the general depression. A. Y. Z.—Amongst the shares mentioned by you I like Nos. 6, 1, and 9 best. As regards the others, you can do better by following my advice under the "Kaffir Circus."

Industrial Shares.

Veritas, Belfast.—1. I do not think much of Cecil Hotel Prefs. 2. Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Preference shares are a good investment. Wexford.—There is no reason for any decline in French Dunlops. They should be held. Ivan.—Prospects seem to be fair; but there is no temptation to buy just now. T. E. C.—1. Nitrate prospects are not very flourishing at present, and the Liverpool, Limited, has not escaped either. 2. No; too speculative. Wulstan.—No recent news is to hand; but you should certainly hold, as the position in the United States is improving. Brush.—I think it will be better to hold, and sell on a recovery. E. C. C.—1. Certainly not; the system is utterly rotten. 2. By all means hold Cycle Tubes for a rise, which is not far off, and buy more to average. 3. No; but Gladiators (Clément, Gladiator, and Humber—France) Ordinary are at present likely to go much better. 4. Bagot Tyre and French Dunlops are also promising. I do not care for the other shares mentioned by you. Edington.—The Company is doing fairly well, and the shares are quoted ⅛. Nil Desperandum.—I do not see any reason for your indignation, and as you have the option of getting your money back, you should ask for its return. J. A. B.—1. I advise you to have absolutely nothing to do with this concern. 2. No; amongst Cycle shares, I should prefer Gladiators (Clément, Gladiator, and Humber—France) Ordinary shares. Scarborough.—I have no special information with reference to the business of Hobbs, Hart, & Co.; but if the concern does not pay any dividends, it would be advisable that the shareholders should unite to obtain some information as regards the position.

Mixed Investments.

Nemo, Exeter.—1. A fair investment. 2. Yes; the New Incandescent Gas Lighting (Sunlight Patent) Company appears to be a promising speculative investment. Gas.—1. A fair security. 2. I have repeatedly stated the security which is behind these. 3. Ditto. Amongst the shares Nos. 4 to 9, I prefer Nos. 4 and 8. Sherwood.—1. A fair investment. 2. Why did you not take my advice to sell Hit or Miss at about 1½. At present I distinctly say hold. Verax.—1. No; you can do much better in other West Australian shares mentioned in my letter. M. C., Kensington.—You had better keep your stocks Nos. 1 to 5, as they are likely to improve. Rusticus.—1. After the heavy fall I think it will be advisable to hold these bonds. 2. Hold Metropolitan Districts by all means. Anxious Inquirer, Wolverhampton.—Hold Dover "A" by all means; they have already recovered, and there is every prospect of a further improvement. 2. Also hold Croydon Consols and North Croydon Consols. These mines are doing exceedingly well, and, as you are doubtless aware, a dividend of 1s. per share will be paid on Croydon Consols in November. X. X.—1. Yes; as the interest is guaranteed by the Transvaal Government, this is a fair investment. 2. No reason to sell Buenos Ayres Great Southern. 3. Argentines are likely to eventually improve; do not sell now. Nick o' Lass.—A. A fair Industrial investment. The Mining shares Nos. 1 to 9 should undoubtedly be held now that a recovery is in progress; also Nos. 17 and 18. Take a fair profit on Nos. 10 to 16, when you can get it. A. W. Z., Bury.—Hold all your Mining shares Nos. 1 to 6 for a rise. Amongst these North Croydon Consols (4) and Cue 1 (6) look very promising. No temptation to buy No. 7 just now, and No. 8 is highly speculative. Circle.—1. I repeat that I do not like the surroundings of this concern. 2. The present price is 101-3; and dividends are payable on November 1 and May 1. 3. New Zealand mines are likely to come to the front again; hold. Financier.—1. Hold Londonderry shares, and see remarks in last week's issue under "Golden West Australia." 2. Yes. D. C. S.—You have done exceedingly well in buying Croydon Consols and North Croydon Consols, and these must already show you a considerable profit (Nos. 1 and 2). No reason for selling Nos. 3 and 4 now, neither is it necessary to sell Palace shares now. Cestreham.—I am glad you did so well in Croydon Consols on my advice, but these shares will go still much higher. I dare say you will get a better profit on the Cycle shares Nos. 1 and 2 in the near future, as a strong upward movement in this section is probable. 3. Hannan's Brownhill Central are no catch. 4. A fair investment. 5. I do not like these at all. Antoinette.—1. No option but to hold Langlaagte Star; they are recovering again, and will go much higher. 2. Hold. 3. Certainly hold these shares, they are now improving. 4. Nothing is known yet. 5. This mine will no doubt recover again. New Comer.—You should hold all your mining shares Nos. 1 to 7, 9 and 10 for a rise now, which is already in progress, and average if you can afford to take the shares up. I do not think much of No. 13, and the Cycle shares, No. 8, I have never recommended; but they may have a chance now. If you hold Nos. 11 and 12, you should see them improve in the near future. I do not advise any exchange in your holdings at present. Ajax, Newport.—An outside broker, who very frequently does not settle up promptly. If you cannot obtain your money or stock, you should employ a solicitor at once. New Primrose are likely to advance. Buenos Ayres Great Southern Ordinary stock is a good investment. Imperial, Ipswich.—I see no reason for selling any of your investments Nos. 1 to 6 at present; await a better opportunity. K. O. P.—I quite agree with you that you should get out of your holdings Nos 1 to 3, but the present seems to be a very bad time, and I should advise you to hold for a recovery. Leo. M.—You have invested in Nos. 1, 3, and 7 entirely against my advice; what do you want me to tell you now? When you get a good profit on the Dunlops (Nos. 4, 5, and 6) you should take it. West Australian Exploring and Finance (9) should be held for a further rise. 10. What nonsense! If you cannot buy the Barnato Banks, you can purchase the new Johnnies Consols, which is the same thing, as this Corporation have taken over the Barnato Bank. Bolive.—1. Cycle Tubes are likely to improve. 2. A fair mining risk. 3. I do not advise purchase of De Lamar. 4. A good West Australian Trust Company. 5. Yes.

Notice to Connoisseurs of Fine Dry Champagne.—Périnet & Fils' Cuvée Réservée, Extra Sec, is in magnificent condition, at Hotel Cecil, Hotel Savoy, Midland Grand Hotel, Spiers & Pond's Hotels and Buffets, and most leading Hotels & Restaurants.

Various Investments.

The Money Market has hardened, and gilt-edged stocks were at one time considerably affected by fears of a rise in the Bank rate, Consols touching 107⅜, but when the announcement of a 4 per cent. rate was actually made a general rally ensued, the event having been fully discounted. Consols are up again at 108¼, and Three and a Half per Cent. India stock has improved to 117. Colonial bonds and British Corporation stocks show some irregularity, but there has not been much of a further fall. Silver is unchanged for the week at 30 1/16d., and Rupee Paper has recovered to 61½. In Cycle shares a more active market has to be reported, and it already looks as if a period of increasing business were at hand in anticipation of an excellent cycling season next year. Dunlops have improved to 1 7/16 for the Deferred, and Humber Extensions have been steady at 1⅜, while an improvement to 4 has occurred in Cycle Components. The chief relapse is marked in Beestons, which have dropped to 4¼, notwithstanding the report that a new big deal was on hand, and that a fancy price had been offered for the shares. A very active demand has set in for Gladiators (Clément, Gladiator and Humber (France), Limited), applicants for shares not having by any means received their full allotments, and the Ordinary have now advanced to ¼ to ⅜ premium. Bagots have risen sharply to ⅝ premium, the new Company having been well received; while there is a whisper that this Company will eventually be taken over by the Dunlop. I also hear that the debenture-issue of the Mexican Cotton Estates of Tlahualilo has met with a favourable reception on the part of the public. I have received a communication from Mr. C. G. Champion, notary public, of 17, Ironmonger-lane, E.C., informing me with reference to my remark concerning the Savoy Theatre of Varieties, Dublin, that his clients (the purchasers of this undertaking) were in complete ignorance of the statement made by me, and that the only knowledge they have of Frank Barlow and his circular was that contained in Truth. I have much pleasure in publishing this statement; but this makes the action of Mr. Frank Barlow, stock and share dealer, 7, Leadenhall-street, E.C., all the more strange; as in his circular he went into the minutest particulars concerning the flotation of the new Company, of which he stated the capital at £40,000 in Ordinary shares, the vendor taking £8,000, leaving £32,000, which it was fully expected would be applied for two or three times over. Mr. Barlow also mentioned that in making applications for shares he would advise his clients to apply for 25 per cent. more than the number required, as he could not guarantee applicants the full number of shares applied for. The circular concludes by stating that the solicitor for the vendor was Mr. C. G. Champion, and that the architects were Mr. Crewe and Mr. J. J. Farrell. It would be interesting to know whether Mr. Barlow has received many cheques as deposits in respect of shares in the Savoy Theatre of Varieties, Dublin, which he invited when sending out his circular by appending the following form:—

Oct. , 1896.

To Mr. Frank Barlow,
Leadenhall-street, London, E.C.

Dear Sir,—I, the undersigned, agree with you, that in the event of the incorporation of the Savoy Theatre of Varieties, Dublin (hereinafter called the "Company") and the prospectus of the Company being issued in the form finally approved by the Board of Directors, I undertake at or before the first allotment to apply for £ shares of the Company, and for that purpose I beg to enclose you my cheque for £ , being a deposit of per cent. in respect of such shares, and I hereby request that you will make application for shares on my behalf forthwith, and I agree to accept the same or any smaller number that may be allotted to me.

J. Edwards & Co., stock and share dealers, Arundel-street, W.C., are now to the front with their October circular, which contains a list of twenty-four "operations" successfully closed in 1896, and numerous extracts from letters received from clients, all of whom express themselves gratified at the results obtained for them. Unfortunately, only the places where these clients reside are mentioned. These testimonials would gain very much in value if the names and addresses of the fortunate clients were published, and I repeat that I would like to meet some of the lucky people in the flesh who have obtained large profits from J. Edwards & Co.—Your affectionate Uncle, MOSES.

QUEER STORY.

A CAMBRIDGESHIRE FORECAST.

"MR. CHIVERS, Sir, the guv'nor wants to speak to you."

I was thus addressed by our office-boy, as I sat in my small sanctum, correcting a big bundle of proofs for our next issue. I held, at that time, an appointment on the staff of The Beyond, the well-known weekly organ of the spiritualistic movement, and I thought myself not a little privileged to serve under the famous Mr. X., who was then editor.

Unlike many of our contributors, who wrote for their bread, without having the smallest faith in the occult views which they so sedulously promulgated, I firmly believed in psychical and spiritualistic phenomena; and on that account, chiefly, I had gained the particular esteem of our celebrated editor, who was himself an ardent apostle of the same views. Being, in addition, a man of great ability and fine business powers, he had worked up The Beyond to a remarkable pitch of success, and had really made spiritualism "catch on"—a fact which our constantly-increasing circulation abundantly proved.

There was, indeed, no doubt that our paper had by this time achieved a position, of its kind, unique; or that Mr. X. enjoyed a reputation and a standing which placed him on a level with the most famous journalists of his day. No doubt he was fortunate in the times on which he had fallen. Society just then was in a mood to be fascinated with the mysteries of psychical phenomena. And the public, following Society, developed quite an eager interest in the subject. The reports in The Beyond evoked many communications from our numerous readers, and we, on the staff, were always busy sifting and examining the many wonderful cases which were submitted to us. Mr. X. would never report any case until he had satisfied himself of its authenticity. In so doing, he spared neither trouble nor expense. He took care that even the most sceptical should not find a handle against him; and that, however much they might differ from his inferences, they should not be able to upset the facts and data upon which these inferences were based. It soon, therefore, became recognised that the cases reported in The Beyond could not be treated as mere vulgar inventions, and that, as far as external facts went, it was seldom possible to discredit them.

On receiving Mr. X.'s message from the office-boy, I at once repaired to his room.

"You'll excuse my interrupting you," he said, as soon as I was fairly inside, "but I want you to undertake a rather important commission for me."

I asked him what it was.

"To attend a sale at Messrs. Blanks' rooms this afternoon," he told me, naming a prominent firm of West End auctioneers.

"Do you wish me to buy something for you?"

"Yes, if you please. I would go myself, but I have particular reasons for not doing so, which I will explain to you. Did you ever hear of Mad Langley?"

"Yes. A sort of modern Jeremiah, wasn't he? I believe I have read of him. But surely he died many years ago."

"About twenty. He made some stir—you may have heard—in the early sixties by his sensational prophecies. Now, however, most people have forgotten him. But a few of his Sibylline leaves are still about, and are rather valued as curios. I have two of them myself."

"Are any of these to be offered for sale at Messrs. Blanks?"

"Entre nous, yes; but without the knowledge of the auctioneers or of the public."

I looked puzzled at that. It sounded decidedly enigmatical.

"See, here," explained Mr. X., producing a sale catalogue, and turning over the pages till he came to one which he had scored on the margin with red pencil, "you observe this lot—No. 119—described as an assorted packet of curious old documents, some of them containing valuable autographs. Well, my attention has been called to this bundle by an obliging stranger, an autograph-collector, who examined it, with a view to purchase. He very kindly wrote me on the subject, saying the autographs therein contained were worthless, and that he should not make a bid; but that there was one rather curious document in the lot—of no real value—which might, however, be interesting to me, as it was rather in my line; and that, if I cared to have it, probably I might pick it up for an old song. I wrote and thanked him for his civility, and went and had a look myself. I was very glad that I had done so. The document is far more valuable than he supposed. It is one of Mad Langley's prophecies."

"And he did not recognise that?"

"Evidently not. You see the thing has no signature; and nothing, except the handwriting, to show by whom it was penned. If it had not been that I am thoroughly conversant with Mad Langley's caligraphy, I myself should have been equally ignorant."

"And to what does this prophecy relate—may I ask?"

"You shall see when you bring it back," replied Mr. X., with an air of suppressed excitement. "In the meanwhile, what I wish to impress upon you is, that I must have that document for The Beyond at any cost. But, naturally, I would rather get it cheap, if I can. That is why I wish you to attend the sale instead of me. I should probably be recognised, and they might set some one on to run me up. You, however, will be unknown; and can just pose as a stranger who has dropped in casually, on the chance of picking up a bargain."

"At what hour is the sale?"

"It begins at three. But, of course, this lot may not be offered until some hours later."

"And to what figure am I limited?"

Mr. X. took out his cheque-book, wrote out a cheque, and handed it to me.

"There," he said, "you can cash that at the bank on your way. It is for fifty pounds. But I do not imagine that you will need a quarter of it. Indeed, if—as I hope—no one else has recognised Mad Langley's production, you may get the lot knocked down to you for less than fifty shillings. However, I must secure it, in any event; and so I wish you to have a liberal margin of money."

"Very well," I said. "Then I am to pay the full purchase-money on the spot, and bring the lot away with me?"

"Yes, if you please. And I need not say that you should avoid, as far as possible, any appearance of keenness in the matter."

"I have attended sales before," I said, laughing. "And I believe I can be trusted to keep my head."

Three o'clock found me at Messrs. Blanks' auction rooms. The sale began pretty punctually; but there were many lots to be disposed of; and mine was not put up till nearly six. Some one made a bid of ten shillings. I increased it to eleven. The other man went to fifteen. I topped him by half-a-crown—making my bid as hesitatingly and indifferently as I could. My opponent bade a sovereign, and I made it a guinea. Thirty shillings. I bade thirty-one and six. He jumped to two pounds. I made it guineas. He seemed to be getting keen. He went to three pounds. I again made it guineas. And so we went on and on, until we soon found ourselves in the tens, and then in the twenties. From the determination with which my opponent was bidding, I had no doubt that either he—or his employer—were possessed of the same knowledge as Mr. X., and that he meant, if possible, to secure the lot. He grew rather annoyed with me, I thought, as I kept raising him time after time—bidding guineas against his pounds.

Then he made a big jump.

"Thirty pounds," he bid.

"Guineas," said I.

"Thirty-five pounds."

"Guineas."

"Forty pounds."

"Guineas."

He hesitated a moment, glaring at me fiercely; then he threw up the sponge.

"Forty guineas—gentlemen. Going—going—" said the auctioneer. Down came the hammer. "It's yours, sir."

I waited till the sale was over, paid my money, and possessed myself of lot 119. It was quite a small bundle and went easily into my hand-bag. As I was leaving the sale room, my opponent—a shrewd-looking old fellow with a hooked nose and a pronounced stoop—came up and accosted me.

"Ah!" he said, with a nod of his head. "You've paid a heavy figure for that little bundle of paper."

"Not much heavier than you were willing to pay," I retorted.

"May I ask whether you were buying for yourself?" he said, peering at me with keen inquisitiveness.

"Really, sir," I told him, "I must decline to gratify your curiosity."

"Ah, well! No offence, young man, no offence. But as I could not get that document myself, I should be glad to know that it has fallen into appreciative hands."

"You may rest easy on that score," I replied, as I turned away.

His words confirmed me in the opinion which I had already formed—viz., that he too was in the secret of the Mad Langley document. But I must say, I wondered that either he or Mr. X. should be willing to pay so much money for it. Of course, I had not then seen the document. And when, on my return to the office, my chief selected it from the bundle, and handed it to me for perusal—with a keen, excited expression upon his face—my surprise at his setting so high a value on the prophecy was not, at first, diminished.

The paper was yellow, and the ink brown, with age; it bore the following inscription:—

"I was at Newmarket this afternoon and saw Persephone win the Cambridgeshire. A good race. The mare won by sheer gameness. Sir George is to be congratulated on this turn in his luck."

"I see nothing prophetic in that," I ejaculated. "It simply reads like a note from a diary."

"Exactly," responded Mr. X., with great impressiveness. "But a diary of the future, not of the past. Mad Langley's prophecies always ran in that form. He imitated it, I believe, from the Book of the Revelation. You have not remarked the date, written small in the bottom left-hand corner. What do you make it to be?"

"October 24, 189—," I spelt out. And then I exclaimed, with a sudden rush of amazement, "Why that is to-morrow."

"Just so. You are no racing man, I believe—are you?"

I shook my head.

"Well, just look here," he said, handing me a newspaper. "That, as you see, is to-day's Daily Telegraph. Read out the headings of the first column on the third page. Have you found it? Well?"

I read out the following:—

"'Eve of the Cambridgeshire.

"'Probable Starters and Jockeys:

"Then the Cambridgeshire is to-morrow?" I ejaculated.

"Precisely. But reserve your full measure of surprise until you have read the list of probable starters. What is the third name there mentioned?"

I cast my eye down the paragraph and read this:—

"Sir George Pilcher's Persephone—S. Turner."

I felt quite dazed with astonishment. For the minute I could find no words.

"Ah!" said Mr. X., whose eyes seemed to burn with a scarcely suppressed excitement. "Now you see something prophetic—eh? Or does it not strike you as marvellous that a man who died twenty years ago should have named—I will not say the winner, for I cannot say that yet, though I am convinced that Persephone will win—but the favourite, and the favourite's owner, in this year's Cambridgeshire?"

"Are you—you—sure that this is a genuine production of Mad Langley's!" I stammered.

"I would stake my life upon it! I know his handwriting well. If you come home with me to-night, I will show you other specimens of his writing, which will convince you beyond a shadow of doubt. No! This thing is no forgery. It is indisputably genuine. I can now do what I have been longing to do for years—give to the world a remarkable and striking instance of prophetic power, which is absolutely irresistible. I shall publish this document in our next issue."

"By that time," I said, "the Cambridgeshire will have been run."

"Yes; and Persephone will have won it," exclaimed my chief, excitedly. "It will only need that to make it the most complete and extraordinary case of foresight that has ever been known. Even as it stands now, it is a phenomenal instance. I am indeed a lucky man to have picked up this document."

I went home with him later to his private house. He showed me two of Mad Langley's prophecies which he already had in his possession. I compared the handwriting of these with that of the Cambridgeshire document. That it was identical was obvious at a glance. I noticed, however, that the two other prophecies referred to far more sensational events. The one, a disastrous war with the United States; the other, a successful mutiny in India. Both these calamities were to burst upon England during the month of December in this present year. I shuddered as I read them. If he had shown such accuracy of detail in his Cambridgeshire forecast, who could say what significance was to be attached to these more terrible prophecies? And if, to complete it, Persephone won the race to-morrow, those other prophecies might well, indeed, inspire alarm.

I waited, next afternoon, for the news from Newmarket, with an eager anxiety that that of no desperate plunger on the race could have equalled. As soon as I heard the boys in the street vociferating—"Special edishun—hall the winners!"—I rushed out and bought a paper. My heart seemed to stand still as I turned to the stop-press telegrams, and, under the head of Cambridgeshire, saw printed, at the top, the name Persephone.

* * * * *

In the next issue of The Beyond we published a full account of this extraordinary and miraculous affair, and printed a facsimile of the Mad Langley prophecy. It naturally produced an immense sensation. Some of the sceptics, it is needless to say, tried to ridicule and discredit the whole affair, but we soon silenced them by the incontestable proofs which we were able to bring forward. First, there was the original MS. of the prophecy, which we willingly produced for the inspection of any bonâ-fide inquirer, and the genuineness of which none of the many who came to see it could seriously dispute. The handwriting was so obviously that of Mad Langley. Nor was this all. Mr. X. was at great pains to trace, as far as possible, the history of the famous document. And his inquiries resulted in further corroborating its authenticity. Messrs. Blank, at our request, gave us the name of its former owner, and we at once applied to him for any information that he might be able to afford. He was an idle, careless young swell (we ascertained), who had been driven to sell most of his family effects by financial difficulties. As to the Mad Langley prophecy, he could not say very much. Indeed, he had scarcely taken the trouble to more than casually inspect the bundle of papers, comprised in lot 119, before it was sent to the auctioneers; though, as far as he recollected, there was "rather a rummy old document" among them which said something about the Cambridgeshire. He supposed that his uncle, Major Q., who had collected the papers, must have included it among the others as a sort of curiosity. His uncle had died intestate, and he had succeeded to his property as heir-at-law. But he had been on bad terms with the old gentleman, and, during his later years, had hardly spoken to him. He did know, however, that his uncle had, many years ago, lived at Balderstone, in Essex. This was a very significant fact. Balderstone was the village in which Mad Langley had spent the last decade of his life.

We published a full report of all this in The Beyond, and invited our readers to communicate to us any information bearing on the matter, of which any of them might be possessed. In this way we arrived at another link in the chain of evidence. For half a dozen different persons, who had been connected with the village of Balderstone in the early sixties, wrote to us independently, saying that Major Q. and Mad Langley had been on intimate terms for some years; indeed, that during the latter part of the madman's life, no one else from outside had been allowed to enter his house. Thus, as far as circumstantial evidence could do it, the authenticity of the document was fully established.

In the same issue of The Beyond, in which we printed a full report of this evidence, with the greatest possible detail of name, place, date and circumstance, we also published fac-similes of the two other Mad Langley prophecies, which Mr. X. had in his possession. The effect produced by them upon the public mind has never been equalled in the annals of such forecasts. For published as they were upon the top of the Cambridgeshire prophecy, which had been so literally and wonderfully fulfilled, they commanded a widespread credence, extending to many level-headed persons, who were ordinarily the reverse of superstitious. And I have no doubt that even of those who scoffed at the prophecies most loudly, and affected to account for the Cambridgeshire fulfilment as a mere coincidence, not a few felt secretly uneasy about the two impending disasters which Mad Langley had foreshadowed.

I cannot adduce a more striking and a more practical proof of the genuine belief inspired by these prophecies, than the state of the Stock and Share Market during the subsequent month. This (as the simple result of a prophecy) was as unparalleled as it was significant. Try how our enemies would to discount the fact, and assert, as they did, that the uneasiness on 'Change arose from other causes, they could not deny that Indian and American securities were particularly affected by it. I have not now the quotations of that date to hand; but if I had, I could name more than fifty instances, in these two markets, in which first-class bonds depreciated during that November 10 to 20 per cent. In fact, some of the smaller men were actually ruined by the quasi-panic.

One afternoon towards the end of November, Mr. X. came into my sanctum, looking very worried and depressed. I saw at once, from his demeanour, that something disagreeable had happened. He shut the door behind him and flung himself into an easy chair.

"Chivers," he said, "I've been fooled—ridiculously, idiotically fooled. I shall throw up the editorship."

"For heaven's sake, don't dream of such a step as that. What is the matter? What has happened?"

"That Cambridgeshire prophecy—a fraud—a forgery," he answered, in a hoarse voice.

"A forgery? Why, we proved its authenticity," I gasped. "It cannot be a forgery."

"But it is, for all that. There was an original Cambridgeshire Prophecy by Mad Langley, in lot 119, when it went to the auctioneers. But between the time when it arrived there and the time when I inspected the papers, the real one—an utterly false and fatuous forecast, no doubt—was abstracted, and a forged one substituted."

"Impossible! who has told you this?"

"The very man who bid against you at the auction."

"What? An old fellow, with a hooked nose, shrewd eyes, and a pronounced stoop?"

"Yes, yes. That's the man. He, too, has been duped by the forger, though not in the same way as we have. He has been swindled by him out of a promised reward for his services, and he has made his revelation to me with a view to revenge. Not that either of us is likely to secure that, for I understand that the villain has some time left the country."

"But—but—why did he bid so high against me?"

"Ah! That was the artfulness of it. The whole fraud has been managed with a perfectly diabolical ingenuity, and this is only one of a dozen other carefully elaborated touches. He was put up to bid simply as a blind—for the purpose of adding verisimilitude to the thing—of finally confirming my confidence in the genuineness of the Mad Langley document. As a matter of fact, this was unnecessary. But you can easily see the extreme cleverness of the dodge."

"Good heavens!" I ejaculated. And then, after a pause, I added, "But it may all be a lie. Have you made any investigations?"

"A few, with the result that my informant's story is shown to be only too accurate," said Mr. X., wretchedly.

"But what was the motive?" I exclaimed. "Surely it was not worth while to run such risks for a matter of forty guineas?"

"Ah! you do not understand. If my information is correct, not forty guineas but four million, more likely, will have hung upon this gigantic swindle, into the service of which I have been so humiliatingly pressed. The forger was employed by a gang of brokers—I gather—with a view to big operations in the Indian and American markets. And the worst of it is, we shall probably never be able to put our hands upon these prime movers. Curse Mad Langley! Curse the whole business!" ejaculated Mr. X., with vehemence.

Further inquiries made it tolerably certain that the above solution was correct. It was impossible not to be struck by the astuteness and ingenuity with which the fraud had been carried out, even taking into consideration the luck that favoured its originators in the victory of the Cambridgeshire favourite. What the profits gained by them amounted to, I cannot say. But they must have been enormous. And the cup of our chagrin and humiliation was filled by the discovery that they had covered their tracks so artfully that we had no chance of putting salt upon their tails. None of these scoundrels was ever brought to justice.

MUSIC.

WHAT A BARREL ORGAN COSTS.

THE brief reference in Truth last week to the woes of the distracted resident of Hereford-square and other long sufferers from barrel organs reminds me that chance recently placed in my way many interesting particulars as to the cost of these instruments of torture, and the approximate profits which they earn. It seems that of late there has been a "slump" in the music of the streets, and the takings have dropped considerably. It is, of course, possible that recent discussion has opened the eyes of the British householder, who now knows his legal powers, and refuses any longer to be blackmailed by the grimy sons of Italy. The hired dancing children, who so affected M. Paul Renaud, and the grown-up damsel who displayed her faded lingerie to the music of the piano organ in the public streets seem also to have disappeared, owing, perhaps, to a hint from the police. At the seaside resorts, I am told, organs have been plentiful enough, but in London they are now mostly to be found outside the public-houses. I am also informed that there is a good deal more of the English element among the organ grinders than there used to be a few years ago. This is not surprising considering the small sum now necessary for the stock-in-trade of the musician of the street. Twenty years ago the organs were mostly owned by five padroni, each having from thirty to one hundred men, each man either hiring the organs at from 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. a day or sharing the takings with his padrone.

Nowadays there is still a good deal of hiring going on, but many of the grinders are proprietors of their own organs. I have before me a price-list of these machines, the cheapest of which is one of twenty-four notes, playing eight tunes. I have deducted the trade discount, which is frankly stated, and I find this instrument can be had for £12, while, like everything else in these advanced times, it can be purchased on the three years' hire system. The ordinary piano organs are, however, a trifle larger. One in Italian walnut inlaid case, with thirty-three notes, playing eight tunes, would come to about £17. 10s.; while another, with thirty-five notes and nineteen visible pipes, playing eight tunes, is 20 gs. This seems to be the largest size that is made, and it is pretty easy to perceive that when the instrument is let out at 15s. a week, a padrone must make a pretty considerable profit out of it. Indeed, I am told that although there has been more than one failure of recent years among the barrel-organ makers, thereby showing that there is a considerable cutting of prices, yet that nobody ever heard of the bankruptcy of a padrone. The chief expense after the organ has first been bought, lies in the change of tunes. Each barrel contains eight or nine tunes, and new barrels cost from £4 to £4. 10s. a piece. The grinder is extremely particular as to his choice of tunes. The highest priced instruments, so far at any rate as the cost of hiring is concerned, contain the latest examples of art from the music-halls. These are intended to be played in front of public-houses, where I learn that, beyond all question, the organ-grinder reaps his largest harvest. Whether there is any affinity between beer and the barrel organ, or whether it requires a certain amount of alcoholic stimulant or deadening of the senses to thoroughly appreciate this ear-splitting instrument, I am unaware. On the other hand, dance tunes go down best in the middle-class neighbourhoods, where the organ-grinder now depends upon the generosity of servant-girldom, rather than on the more precarious income derived by blackmailing the irate British householder. In these middle-class streets indeed, a monkey for the delectation of servants and of children at the parlour or nursery window is a valuable adjunct to the music box. The older barrels, when the tunes have become too hackneyed even for the London street organ, go into the provinces. The fiction that the barrel organ is the orchestra of the gutter children, has long ago been exploded. The Italian grinder, like his British colleague, is actuated by the commercial rather than the philanthropic spirit, and he certainly will not waste his time in the poverty-stricken courts and alleys, where pennies are as scarce as cowslips on Cornhill.

The fact may not be generally known that we owe the barrel organ primarily to the Church. Towards the end of the last century barrel organs were indeed very largely used in church services. In those days organists were few, and large barrel organs, set to hymn tunes and psalm chants and sacred melodies, were cheaper and more reliable. There was a famous barrel organ in Fulham church in the second half of the last century made by Wright, founder of the pipe organ building firm of Robson. Then, again, there was a celebrated organ built for Viscount Kirkwall, and the still more famous "Apollonicon"—a gigantic barrel organ with 1,900 pipes, costing £10,000, and occupying five years in its construction. This instrument, which amazed the last generation, was exhibited until it was broken up in 1840, the material then being used for Church organs. The barrel organ of the streets was unknown until the early part of the present century, when the old-fashioned instrument standing on a sort of crutch stick began to be manufactured by a miscreant named Hicks, whose name will go down to a nervous posterity with the anathemas of every one possessing delicacy of ear. There is said still to be an export of barrel organs to the West Indies and to Brazil, but in every European country except England barrel organs are either absolutely forbidden or their players are under severe restrictions.

The proposal to organise a season of opera at Easter at Drury Lane has fallen through. It is an open secret that Mr. J. M. Glover, the conductor and partly the composer of that curious pot-pourri, "The Little Genius," was intimately associated with the out-of-season operatic enterprises of the late Sir Augustus Harris. Mr. Glover, it seems, has command of the necessary capital, and was willing to take Drury Lane for a six-weeks' season of English opera at Easter, and Covent Garden for a similar term in the autumn. He has, however, been unable to secure either house, and thus, with the exception of the grand season, opera is likely to vanish from the London stage. Whether it will very greatly be missed is altogether another matter; although some of our more youthful mentors are never tired of telling us that cheap opera is the one thing that is wanted.

The suggested autumn season of Italian opera, which was officially announced from Covent Garden, fell through, because the Italian speculators, as I understand, did not plank down the necessary guarantee. The nonsensical proposal to hire the house for promenade concerts to a German band has likewise collapsed, and the Fancy Dress Balls will begin on the 18th prox. On Lady-day the Harris régime at Covent Garden will come to an end, and for the summer season, at any rate, the house will pass into the hands of a syndicate of the subscribers, with Earl de Grey and Mr. Higgins at their head. These gentlemen will have the use of the Covent Garden scenery, dresses, &c., and will also acquire the valuable wardrobe and paraphernalia used in opera by the late Sir Augustus Harris. The De Reszkes will, of course, be the stars of the season. According to present arrangements, Mme. Melba, who asked £240 a night, will not return, and this may possibly lead the way to the most welcome re-appearance of Mme. Calvé, who was much missed last year. Mme. Nordica will also be a member of the troupe, and will play Brunnhilde to the Siegfried of M. Jean de Reszke. M. Edouard de Reszke, who is by no means a "quick study," is willing to undertake Wotan in only one of Wagner's operas, but M. Jean de Reszke hopes to appear both as Siegfried and Siegmund. Madame Eames will also be a member of the party, and will in all probability play in Mancinelli's opera, should that work be produced, the role of Hero, which was created by Madame Albani at the Norwich Festival. The De Reszkes, Calve, Eames (with Mr. Edward Michael, her manager), and nearly all the American contingent sail for New York in the course of this week.

M. Colonne, possibly owing to his ignorance of our language, seems to have formed a wholly erroneous idea of the causes which led to his non-success in London. He says he looked through the criticisms of Lamoureux's band, and found complaints made that his rival had tried too much Wagner. Consequently he avoided Wagner as much as possible, and he thinks for this reason he has been severely criticised. M. Colonne is entirely mistaken. The chief complaints made against him were that he vainly attempted to popularise some of the thinnest and weakest works of the modern French repertory, now, thanks mainly to the absurd adulation of the French Press, some of the feeblest music in the world. Instead, M. Colonne should have dosed us with Berlioz, a composer in the interpretation of whose works he is indisputably great.

Mr. Eugene d'Albert drew to the Crystal Palace on Saturday an enormous audience which overflowed from the stalls to the rarely-filled orchestra. It is a pity he did not play better music than his own second concerto; for whatever his executive merits may be, Mr. d'Albert is not a heaven-sent composer. The best thing he did was Liszt's "Napoli," after a very brilliant performance of which he for an encore gave Chopin's "Berceuse." M. Delafosse has returned, this time bringing with him the Belgian violinist, M. Ysaye, at a cost, it is said, of eighty guineas a night. M. Delafosse is best in his quieter moments, for the ways of the new and vigorous school sit awkwardly upon him. Dr. Richter has had a successful provincial tour, the least happy, perhaps, in Glasgow than elsewhere. On Monday he was back again in London, and introduced for the first time Dvorak's latest orchestral ballade, entitled "The Golden Spinning Wheel," a long drawn-out work on an impossible subject. Fancy a modern composer trying to depict in abstract music the antics of a spinning wheel, whose whirl is understood to describe to a king the perpetration of a horrible murder. And imagine a symphonic poem supposed to tell us how the limbs of a martyred young lady were collected, and she was restored to life and the royal marriage bed. Music has no doubt made great strides, but of this sort of nonsense it is incapable. There was, however, an enormous audience who thoroughly enjoyed a practically perfect performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

His many friends will heartily congratulate the well-known Hungarian violinist, M. Tividar Nachez, upon his betrothal to Miss Emily, the only daughter of Mr. Benjamin Shaw, J.P., of the Manor House, Ferriby, Yorkshire. The two, indeed, have been engaged for some little time, and the wedding, which will be a quiet one, will take place from the house of the bride's father in Yorkshire, on Thursday next week.

I have received several more letters in regard to the Lansdowne Cottell business. Most of them must wait, but a communication from Mr. Percy Harrison, who I regret to learn is ill in bed, need not be delayed. Mr. Harrison desires to repeat that his only connection with Mr. Cottell was the letting to him of a room for the purpose of giving lessons, and he repels the contention "that because we let a room to Mr. Cottell and other professors of music for teaching purposes we have been mixed up with their transactions, with which, as a matter of fact, we have nothing more to do than you have." It is not worth while to further argue the matter, the more especially as Messrs. Harrison's connection with Mr. Cottell has ceased, and the honoured name of Harrison can no more be used in connection with the Portsdown-road Conservatoire. I may, however, point out that the actual announcement of Mr. Cottell ran as follows:—"Birmingham and Midlands Districts Branch, at Messrs. Harrison's Music Warehouse, Colemore-row and Bennett's Hill." This, it is perfectly obvious, is a good deal more than a mere address for giving music lessons. Mr. Harrison adds:—

> Failing his—Cottell's—reply to and satisfactory refutation of the very serious charges you have brought against him, I should certainly not now be disposed to accept Mr. Cottell as a tenant, but at the time we did so, we neither knew, nor heard, of anything against him.

Mr. Cottell's new Birmingham address, as I have already stated, is Messrs. Riley, Corporation-street. I have not yet heard from Messrs. Riley, and my other correspondents on Mr. Cottell's matter must please wait until next week.

The Carl Rosa Company have not yet found a London theatre, and are hardly likely to do so for a short season at Christmas. The idea of St. George's Hall is, of course, nonsense. Nevertheless, some of the Carl Rosa people still hope to secure a house for evening operatic performances, which, after the New Year, would be very welcome. Why, by the way, do they not postpone their visit until Easter—a far better period of the year than the pantomime season, and when Drury Lane, at any rate, would be open to them? Mr. Crotty, for a long time one of their principal baritones, came out on Monday at the musical halls as a singer of patriotic songs. Mr. Barton McGuckin, long their principal tenor, started on Saturday with a company for a concert tour in Ireland.

Mortlock's China and Glass Business, Oxford-st., has entered its 150th year, being founded by John Mortlock in 1746. It is carried on by John George Mortlock, the great-great-grandson of the founder, who solicits patronage and recommendation.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

Dearest Amy,—I have never seen London in such a condition of simmer and bubble as it was on Trafalgar Day. The streets were crammed with pedestrians, at least half of whom seemed to be from the provinces. I was in Regent-street with Bee and Clare at about half-past three, but was very glad to get out of it again. The usual rule of the road, by virtue of which people keep to the right, was utterly ignored, and the seething mass of humanity kept getting itself into knots just like a stream bubbling over stones and swirling round in eddies. The bonnet shops were surrounded by crowds of women three or four deep, all a-gaze. Could we have seen into their brains we should have had the mental picture of each spectator imagining her own face in the particular bonnet she had selected as the prettiest.

The Lord Mayor's ball at the Mansion House to the provincial mayors had taken place on the previous evening, and that would account for the presence in town of numerous visitors from the country. It was a most extraordinary state of affairs, and Nelson would have wanted to dance a breakdown if he could have seen the tremendous commotion he caused.

The girls and I had the idea to go and see the Column itself, but as it was shared by some millions of our fellow-creatures, we promptly abandoned it, and turned in instead to look at Peter Robinson's newest and sweetest brightest of evening cloaks.

Lilla went with us to choose one. She would go as far as £20, she said to me as we entered, and I whispered back again, in Mephistophelean accents, "Then it will cost you £35 at least." We looked at an imposing array, panoramically displayed before us on the shoulders of girls so tall and graceful that it involved quite a sum of mental addition to fancy Lilla in the same garments. The brocades in this year's mantles are rich and handsome, the designs large and striking. One exquisite pattern of brocade shows a pale blue background with natural-looking bunches of white ostrich-feathers scattered over it. Each bunch is tied with silver ribbon. Another is of cream-coloured brocade with the design in long-stemmed roses, tied with a bow-knot of pale pink ribbon. The new printed velvets are also much in vogue for opera wraps. The floral designs appear as if painted upon the velvet, and are exquisite in their colour combinations. Plain velvets are also much used, but they serve more as a background for the beauty of their costly trimmings.

Guipure lace, with the design picked out in jewels, adorns many of the newest cloaks, and rare old laces are appliqué upon the opera capes as a trimming. Jabots of lace wander down the front of many of the new circular wraps, and also in frills, making a soft outline for deep fur collars. The very wide circular opera cloaks, with their many gores, have perhaps a gleaming line of jewels down every gore, or a tiny jabot of lace, or a dangling mass of small fur tails, or a soft band of feather trimming. A few of the most costly brocade opera mantles have the design picked out with jewels which produce a most brilliant effect. Magnificent buttons are seen on them, but these are more for ornamentation than use. Some of these buttons are hand-painted miniatures of much beauty.

One of the newest opera wraps looks like an exceedingly wide circular, with a deep square-shaped collar, which shows a drooping tendency at the shoulders. Delicate creamy-white brocade is the material, with a large feather design in yellow. The feathers was tied with gold ribbons, and the deep cape-like collar, edged with a flounce of old lace, fastens at the points with large yellow rhinestones. Around the neck is a high standing collar of real yellow feathers, soft, beautiful, and becoming. This gorgeous wrap is lined throughout with wadded yellow satin.

"The Riding Habit has a perfectly shaped skirt and a beautifully moulded bodice, cut as only Busvine of Brook-street can cut."—The World, July 22nd, 1896.

Something new and striking was an empire cape made of brocade, delicate green in colour, wrought with a conventional design in gold. The brocade hung in graceful loose folds from a brilliantly-jewelled band which outlined the yoke. This band was of gold-woven cloth studded with varying shades of green stones. The short yoke and large bishop sleeves were of black velvet. The cuff which finished the sleeve was a novelty well worth describing. It was a large pointed gauntlet, cut in tabs, which were joined by tiny gold clasps. A very high Medici collar of black ostrich tips completed this novel mantle.

Many of the fashionable theatre capes and cloaks are made this year with the historical Marie Antoinette hoods. A charming little one made of old rose and white matelassé cloth has three short capes and a piquant Marie Antoinette hood lined with a becoming shade of pink satin. Opera capes which hang perfectly square in Henry II. fashion are also much in vogue. Both ermine and chinchilla are used extensively as a lining for the most costly ones. In fact, nothing is too luxurious in the way of an evening cloak.

Lilla's choice fell upon a half-length cloak of chiné brocade lined with ermine and trimmed with skunk and imitation old lace. Such a perfect imitation was the latter that it would take in any one but an expert. It is a most delicious piece of finery, and I don't mind admitting that I felt some emotion akin to grief in not being able to have it for myself. It is hard to see the object of one's affections bestowed upon another and a thicker woman than oneself. That mantle would, I know, be happier with me.

I think I told you some time since that there has been active rebellion going on for a considerable time against the tyranny of white satin and orange blossoms as a bridal livery. Several brides have revolted and chosen materials of a soft, light, and aerial character. On the 30th, at St. Mary's, Cadogan-street, Miss Cara Batten is to be married in a perfectly sweet gown made of fine white muslin over satin in the old-fashioned Empire style. As she is a pretty girl, and very young, she will form an excellent object-lesson in the newer and less trying style of wedding dress. The bridegroom, Mr. Austin Harris, has two very well-known men for brothers: one is Mr. Walter Harris, a great explorer and Eastern traveller, who has written interesting books on his wanderings; and the other Mr. Clement Harris, who has attained some reputation as a musical composer and executant.

The weekly Associates' Teas are to be resumed at the Royal School of Art Needlework this autumn. Last Thursday Countess Grosvenor and Mrs. Percy Wyndham were the hostesses, and on other days the teas are to be given by the Dowager Lady Churchill, and Elizabeth Countess of Winchilsea and Nottingham.

Miss Mary Moore looks so deliciously pretty in the dancing curls of her early Victorian coiffure in "Rosemary" that it would not be surprising if it should become fashionable in a modified way. There is no doubt that dressing the hair close to the eyes improves their appearance immensely, making them look large and bright, and at the same time softening their expression.

I fancy I know why the Royalties, Duchesses, and so on, have been so bent on seeing the "Duchess of Coolgardie" at Drury Lane. There were some well-known faces in the wedding scene at the close, and at least one of the actors is very well known in Society. The Duchess of Coolgardie has some distinguished bridesmaids, and their white and yellow gowns are very becoming.

The members of the New Victorian Club were "at home" to their friends on Wednesday evening last, when the Club premises, situated at 30A Sackville-street, were opened for the first time under the new management, and a most enjoyable evening was spent. The Club, which is the last addition to the number of ladies' clubs in London, meets the much-felt want of many ladies who require some pied-à-terre where they can go whilst up in town for a day's shopping, and where, if they wish to stay, they can obtain bedrooms at a small charge. It is open to both town and country members.

You know how soon silk petticoats wear out? Aggravating things they are, for directly one has become accustomed to them, and on perfectly friendly terms, the silk slits in horizontal lines, and the next phase is ruin and despair. Mr. Charles Lee, of Wigmore-street, has brought out skirts of shot moire which overcome this disadvantage by being made of a material that resembles silk, but is much more durable. There are white silk ones for evening wear. We saw these things when we went to buy warm stockings. I am afraid we are extravagant about this dress item, for none of us can bear darns. Nor do we like very thick stockings, so we spent some time in choosing. The girls chose some broad-ribbed Angola for cycling. By-the-way, we saw some open-work cashmere stockings, intended for those who cannot wear cotton. Good idea, isn't it?

The new shades in gloves are dove, pearl, champagne, string-colour, biscuit, drabs and mushroom, and tan. For evening wear there are all pale colours, and black gloves are again to be much worn with evening dress.

Fancy playing the "Dead March" in Saul on a banjo! I came across it in a selection of music for that lively instrument. Can you imagine the deep boom of the thrilling cannon note produced on the frivolous strings of the "nigger" melodist's favourite tum-tum! I have often tried to think of the converse of "breaking a butterfly on a wheel," and here it is.

Christabel writes me from Rome:—

It would be impossible to imagine dresses more beautiful than those made by Worth for Maria Pia, Dowager Queen of Portugal, to wear at the various ceremonies and fêtes in honour of the marriage of her nephew, the Prince of Naples, with Princess Hélène of Montenegro.

For full-dress day toilette a rich white satin ground is covered closely with a pattern in Genoa velvet comprising all the shades of grey, from the palest up to iron grey. The bodice is high at the back and pointed, the front is draped with folds and opens over a white satin waistcoat, softened with rich Brussels lace falling over it, and four diamond buttons seem to fasten the folds on the shoulder; the skirt is round with a double pleat, forming a tablier in front.

Another lovely day dress is of Indian lampas, the shade called violette de Parme, with a spiral pattern formed of sprays of roses; a broad stripe embroidered with amethysts forms quilles on each side of the skirt, which is made with a demi-train. The bodice is pointed, made high at the back, and cut with a low square in front, some fine old point lace forming a half ruff; the lace as well as the bodice is worked with amethysts, and bouquets of violets are studded about in the lace. The sleeves are very long, open or slashed at the top of the arm and filled in with point lace, set with amethysts to match the bodice.

A morning dress has a lilac satin ground shot with silver, with a pattern in white nacre velvet in relief; the design is very large, and takes up nearly the length of the skirt, which is trained at the back, and the front is covered with sparkling diamond embroidery. The pointed bodice is in the Louis XV. style, and round the low neck is a pointed scallop of diamond embroidery on tulle; Alençon lace glittering with diamonds forms an ample berthe, held up at the shoulders with bouquets of orchids set in the lace.

The dress for grand official ceremonies and full Court attire is simply splendid, and is composed of white damas, with a Renaissance design of branches of laurel leaves interlaced. Here and there where the sprays meet there is a little crown embroidered in gold, diamonds, and topazes. The skirt is open on the left side all the length, and shows an under-skirt of gold guipure closely worked with jewels, and bordered with white feather trimming. On the right side the skirt opens only about half a yard high, but of course revealing the same under-skirt. The white damas bodice has a chérusque (or Valois ruff) of Renaissance gold lace, set with diamonds round the shoulders and bust, and a tuft of white feathers on each shoulder.

The Court train to wear with this is white velvet with the same pattern of laurel as on the skirt, and also the same embroidered and jewelled crowns at the intersection of the sprays. This train is four and a half mètres long (about five yards), and will be worn from the shoulders, coming from under the chérusque. It is lined with royal purple velvet, which is turned back over the train about a hand's breadth, and on this is laid Renaissance gold lace, jewelled, and with an edge of diamonds.

It has been remarked over and over again that, for Autumn and Winter wear, a lady never looks better and more suitably clad than in a Redfern Gown. Messrs. REDFERN'S New Models are now ready. Inspection invited.—26, Conduit-street, W.

FASHIONS UP TO DATE.—An elegant and svelte figure is produced by the easy and perfect-fitting anatomical corset shaped by the experts, Mesdames SYKES, JOSEPHINE, & Co., Anatomical Corsetières, 289, Regent-street, Oxford-circus, London, W.

Eight large tufts or bunches of white ostrich feathers are placed at intervals round the train with diamond bows to fasten them. It is, indeed, a really royal and regal dress. The Dowager Queen is a very fine-looking woman, with a good figure, and will show it off well. For several years I have seen the many beautiful dresses sent to her by Worth, but on this occasion he has surpassed himself (if possible). Such taste and harmony of shades—and, as a rule, Maria Pia very wisely does not launch into colours, but prefers the soft tints of grey, mauve, purple, and lilac, mingled with black and white.

Here are the recipes I promised you. I think you will like this way of serving partridges with French plums :—

Having plucked and cleansed a couple of partridges, remove the breast-bone, working from the neck, fill the cavity with forcemeat, to which add a couple of chopped French plums, a tablespoonful of chopped ham, a dessertspoonful of chopped parsley, and a pinch of salt and pepper. Truss the birds into shape and put them into a stewpan with a sliced onion, two slices of fat bacon, and 1 oz. of butter; fry the birds briskly until they are slightly browned. Then add 2 tablespoonfuls of flour, a pint of stock, a bouquet of herbs, a ripe tomato, 6 peppercorns, a blade of mace, 2 cloves, and a gill of claret; stir until boiling, then place the stewpan in the oven to simmer for an hour and a half. Now take the birds from the braise, remove the string, cut them in halves, and keep them hot on the rack. Skim every particle of grease from the braise, and rub it through the tammy. Return the sauce to the stewpan with the birds to warm, season with salt and pepper and a teaspoonful of lemon juice. Arrange the halves of partridges in a circle in an entrée dish, pour the sauce over, and fill the centre with a compôte of French plums, which have been stewed in a little claret.

Fritters of pheasant livers and mushrooms make an admirable dish for breakfast :—

Wash and take off the gall from about 6 livers, and stew them in a little good gravy for fifteen minutes, adding a shalot stuck with a clove, 4 peppercorns, a blade of mace, a sprig of parsley and thyme, and a slice of lean bacon. When the livers are done drain them on a cloth. Make a batter with a tablespoonful of flour, an egg, a teaspoonful of salad-oil, and a little cold water. Dip the livers one at a time in the batter, and fry by immersing them in hot lard; drain on a paper and arrange them in a pyramid on a dish with a border of mushrooms, to prepare which pare 7 or 8 large mushrooms and lay them, gills upward, on a buttered stewpan; season with salt, pepper, a scraped shalot, a little chopped parsley, and a few drops of lemon-juice; put a small piece of butter on each one, replace the lid, and cook them about ten minutes on a brisk stove. Dish each mushroom on a round piece of buttered toast.

Ever, dear, your loving cousin, MADGE.

VERY SHORTLY.

THE KÁFIRS OF THE HINDU-KUSH.

By Sir GEORGE ROBERTSON, K.C.S.I. With numerous Illustrations by A. D. McCORMICK. Royal 8vo, £1. 11s. 6d.

In October, 1889, I found myself, for the second time, the official guest of the Mehtar of Chitrál, at the fort which constitutes the capital of that country. On my previous visit in 1888, I had seen several Káfirs of the Hindu-Kush, and had heard many tales of their strange manners and customs. The people of Káfiristán had first excited my curiosity during the Afghán War of 1879-80, and seeing them now in the flesh, my interest in them became so intensified that the desire to see them in their own homes was irresistible. I had accordingly asked the Government of India to be allowed to make an attempt to enter the Káfir country, and the permission was accorded me while actually on my way to Chitrál for the second time. The only previous European who had attempted to enter Káfiristán was General (then Colonel) Lockhart, when in command of a mission to examine the Hindu-Kush passes in 1885-86. He had penetrated into the upper part of the Bashgul Valley, and remained there for a few days; but jealousies having broken out amongst the Káfir headmen, he had been compelled to leave the country and return to Chitrál.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

HOW TO MAKE AN INCOME-PAYING HOME.

The object of the above Company is to develop the resources of their estate, consisting of about 12,000 acres, situated in the far-famed Tulbagh district in the Western Province of Cape Colony, about 75 miles distant by rail from Cape Town. They are promoting the establishment of a successful colony. The estate has been surveyed and laid out in blocks of about 40 acres each, a number of which have already been sold. The purchase price of this land this year (with all water facilities) is £12 per acre, threequarters of which can remain bearing interest at six per cent. per annum.

In order to provide for the success of every colonist who has sufficient capital at command to be able to enter into this business, but has no practical knowledge of the work, the company have engaged the services of an efficient manager and a skilled horticulturist; and who will, if desired, plant, cultivate, and attend to the development of each client's farm for one year or more.

Thus any settler, provided he gives ordinary attention to the details of the work this company have undertaken for him, can obtain, under the guidance of a skilled specialist, that practical knowledge which is essential in the working to the best advantage of dairy and fruit farms.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

The Company undertake, if desired, to clear, plant, fence, supervise, and generally manage any holding. They guarantee that 90 per cent. of the trees and vines planted under the supervision of their staff grow to maturity, as specified in the agreement, a copy of which can be obtained on application. The company will manage the estate of any absentee at a charge of £1 a year per acre, and will also undertake to erect on the estate any houses for the residence of a settler, which can be chosen in London before sailing, with estimates given. They further undertake to purchase from a settler, at marketable prices, any approved dairy, farm, and orchard produce.

At the company's headquarters, at Seven Fountains, are the orchard and vineyard belonging to the company, and extensive creameries, packing houses, &c., will be erected as soon as necessary.

Steps are already being taken for the erection of a sugar beet factory, &c., and it is the intention of the company to promote milling and other industries.

THE CAPE COLONISATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

The Company solicit enquiries from families who are seeking a fresh start in life.

Young gentlemen who are looking for an opening in which to make their way.

Farmers who for years have been losing money in this country and would like to start afresh.

Retired members of the Military, Naval, and Civil Services, desiring to increase their incomes.

The delicate (those inclined to bronchial and pulmonary troubles) who need an avenue for making an income in a congenial climate.

The General Manager of the Company is going out at the beginning of October, and will be pleased to have the Company of any one who desires to avail himself of this opportunity of a fresh start in life in a new field.

All are requested to be good enough to place themselves in communication with the Secretary of the Company—

from whom full particulars and papers on all points can be obtained. Also the illustrated book on the subject, price 2s., together with a Manual of Practical Orchard Work at the Cape. Published by the Department of Agriculture of the Cape of Good Hope.

Attention is drawn to the above Stock, which is quoted on the London and leading provincial Stock Exchanges. It receives for each year ending June 30th all dividends paid in excess of 5½ on an equal amount of London and North-Western Railway Ordinary Stock. Its last dividend was at the rate of One Pound Five Shillings Per Cent., which at the present price of the Stock—viz., 29 per cent.—YIELDS A RETURN OF FOUR POUNDS SIX SHILLINGS PER CENT., and EACH ADDITIONAL FIVE SHILLINGS PER CENT. PAID ON LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN ORDINARY STOCK WILL INCREASE THIS RETURN BY SEVENTEEN SHILLINGS PER CENT.

The London and North-Western Railway traffic has increased by over £100,000 during the past 12 weeks, and there is thus every reason to anticipate an increasing dividend. THIS IS THE ONLY LOW-PRICED STOCK BY WHICH AN INTEREST IN THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CAN BE OBTAINED. The register of this Stock is kept by the National Provincial Bank of England, Limited.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

LOCATION.—This Company has been formed to acquire and further develop two mining leases, numbered 2,985 (24 acres, known as "Baby Block"), and 2,986 (12 acres, known as "Bullara Block"), making a total area of 36 acres. The properties are situated at Burbanks, 4½ miles south of Coolgardie, and in the vicinity of the property now being worked by the well-known Burbanks Birthday Gift Gold Mines, Limited, and immediately adjoining the property of the Burbanks North Gold Mining Company. The blocks "Baby" and "Bullara" have been secured by the agent of the Vendor Syndicate after very careful examination, and after developing the properties by actual work.

TIMBER AND WATER SUPPLY.—There is ample supply of timber. There is a good site for a water reservoir, and an extensive catchment area. Professor Nicholas cabled on the 2nd October, "Water plentiful supply."

ASSAYS.—The following is a copy of the assay certificate of four samples of stone taken from the properties, and submitted to Mr. R. A. Rusha, A.O.S.M., Assayer and Metallurgist. Hunt-street, Coolgardie Gold Field, July 15th, 1896.

Sample No.		Assay on dried material. Gold—per ton.	oz.	dwts.	grs.
1870.	IBO.	Ironstained Quartz	5	19	5
1871.	IIBO.	Ironstained Quartz with country matter ...	0	11	10
1872.	IIIBO.	Ironstained Quartz with country matter ...	12	9	21
1873.	2.	Quartz	1	4	12

REEFS.—There are three separate quartz reefs showing an average of over 2 ozs. of gold per ton, and all in a direct line with those of the famous Burbanks Birthday Gift, and a continuation of that property's valuable lodes. These reefs are likely to get richer as greater depth is attained. One reef is traceable from Burbanks Birthday Gift main shaft through the Bullara and Baby leases, being a true fissure vein. This belt of country in which the reef occurs is one of the most auriferous zones in or around Coolgardie. Four shafts have been sunk on the properties. No. 1 and No. 2 are on the Bullara lease, and No. 3 and No. 4 are on the Baby lease. The lode was struck in No. 1 shaft at 73 feet, and at a depth of 86 feet is 6 feet in width. The Eastern Reef at a few feet from the surface has increased in width from 1 foot to 4 feet. A cable dated 2nd October from Professor Nicholas stated that No. 1 shaft is down 102 feet.

REPORTS.—The properties acquired by this Company have been recently reported upon by Professor William Nicholas, F.G.S., Lond., Manager of Burbanks Birthday Gift Mines, and Consulting Engineer of Burbanks North Gold Mine; Mr. W. H. Berryman, Manager of Tindails Coolgardie Gold Mining Company; Mr. E. Herbert Becke, M.E., Metallurgist; Mr. C. Cullen, Mr. F. O. F. Roose, Consulting Mining Engineer. Full copies of these reports can be obtained from the Secretary on application.

Professor Nicholas says: "The reefs are in a direct line with those of the Burbanks Birthday Gift Gold Mines, Limited. I consider the mine has excellent prospects before it."

Mr. W. H. Berryman says: "Taking into consideration the splendid position occupied in relation to 'Burbanks Birthday Gift,' the magnificent prospects of the latter mine, the extensive area of the leases under report, the abundance of timber, the anticipated supply of water, and the last and greatest consideration, the body and thickness of the stone (as proved by several assays taken), I have no hesitation in saying you have acquired a very valuable property, and one from which judicious handling will obtain highly payable results. I have much pleasure in recommending the 'Baby' and 'Bullara' Gold Mines as a sound mining venture."

Mr. E. H. Becke says: "From data I have supplied, I am firmly under the opinion that the property is a most valuable one, and will eventually turn out equally rich as Burbanks Birthday Gift, and it is simply a matter of depth to prove the actual value of the property. Therefore, I have no hesitation in recommending this property to the public as a bona-fide venture, and under skilled management, good machinery, and working capital, am thoroughly confident of the mine turning out one of the most valuable properties in Western Australia.

Mr. C. Cullen says: "From what I have seen and what I know of the country, it will be a great surprise to me if this mine does not equal or even surpass those in its vicinity. I would further advise your sinking a deep shaft near your northern boundary, as on adjacent properties there are shafts sunk in good formations, showing with ordinary reasoning that your reefs go right through your property."

Mr. F. O. F. Roose says: "It is unquestionably one of the most valuable properties to be secured, being in the heart of some of the most prosperous gold mines of the fields, and weighing the important circumstance that the Burbanks line of reef traverses the entire length of the Bullara property for a distance of 2,244 feet, and the enormous body of ore of a highly payable and permanent character to exist at depth, I have the utmost confidence in recommending the property as a mining venture of undoubtedly high value."

Mr. Roose writes under date 25th August, 1896: "I find the reef, cut at 73 ft. depth, continues to remain in the shaft to the depth of 86 ft., where the lode measures 6 ft. in the width, this being the same reef as that in Burbanks Birthday Gift, and is equally as rich in gold. The Eastern Reef, which was disclosed in places on the surface by means of open cuttings, was scarcely a foot wide. By going down to the depth of about 18 ft., the reef has increased in thickness from 1 ft. to 4 ft. I need hardly say I am delighted with the result, and that no words of mine or any other mining engineer in Western Australia can but say you have the next finest property to the Burbanks Birth-day Gift."

The reports of the above well-known experts afford reliable evidence that the reef now being so successfully worked by the Burbanks Birthday Gift traverses the whole length of the properties. The Burbanks Birthday Gift Gold Mines, Limited, have recently crushed 1,500 tons, with a yield of 6,248 oz. of gold, or an average of 4 oz. 3 dwt. 7 gr. per ton, exclusive of tailings, worth about 1½ oz. of gold per ton, and the £1 Shares are now quoted 21-16—2 3-16.

MANAGEMENT.—A cable has been received from the Agent of the Vendor Syndicate stating that Professor Nicholas has been appointed Manager of this Company's property.

CAPITALISATION.—The Directors would point out the moderate capitalisation of Burbanks Main Lode, as compared with the neighbouring Companies.

	Price paid by Company.	No. of Acres.	Cost per Acre.	Provision for working capital.
Burbanks Birthday Gift Gold Mine ...	£125,000	40	£3,125	£25,000
Burbanks North ...	£75,000	24	£3,125	£25,000
Burbanks Main Lode	£32,500	36	£902	£32,500

Another favourable feature of Burbanks Main Lode is that one-half the capital is set apart for working. The Directors intend to rapidly push on developments and commence crushing at the earliest possible moment.

TERMS OF PURCHASE.—The Australian Search Syndicate, Limited, as vendors, have fixed the consideration to be paid by the Company for the purchase of the properties at £32,500, payable as to £10,000 in cash, and £22,500 in fully-paid shares. This will leave 32,500 shares for providing working capital.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained at the Bankers, Broker, Solicitors, and at the Offices of the Company. October 21st, 1896.

The LIST of APPLICATIONS will OPEN on WEDNESDAY, the 28th day of OCTOBER, 1896, and will CLOSE on or before FRIDAY, the 30th day of OCTOBER, 1896, for both London and the Country.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company is an extension of William Yates & Company, Limited, Brewers, The Castle Brewery, Ardwick, Manchester. The business has been and is a most successful one, and it is now proposed to carry on the business on a broader basis, and to acquire further properties as opportunity offers.

This Company will acquire the following valuable properties, viz.:—(a) The Freehold Brewery and Land, with fixed plant, cooperage, workshops, offices, and stabling; (b) 98 Freehold and 11 Copyhold Fully Licensed and Beer Houses; (c) 11 Long Leasehold Fully Licensed and Beer Houses, having upwards of 60 years to run; (d) 55 Fully Licensed and Beer Houses, held on short leases and yearly tenancies; (e) A number of Freehold shops, houses and cottages, and Leasehold cottages and shops, all of which adjoin the Brewery, or the licensed properties above-mentioned.

Messrs. Ashworth, Mosley, & Co., Chartered Accountants, Manchester, whose Certificate is appended, have audited the Accounts of William Yates & Company, Limited, since October, 1893, and certify that before deducting interest the net profits since that date have been as follows:—

For the 2 years and 9 months ended June 30th, 1896, £63,118. 10s. 8d., or a yearly average of £22,952 3 10

For the 9 months ended June 30th, 1896, £21,169. 2s. 1d., or at the rate for a complete year of 28,225 9 5

The proceeds of this issue will provide the Company with £77,000 beyond the means at the disposal of the old Company, from which the Directors expect an increase in the net profits.

The price at which the business and assets of the Company, as existing on September 30th, 1896 (from which date the transfer is to take effect as a going concern), are to be taken over, is £172,725, subject to the new Company taking over the existing £100,000 5 per cent. First Mortgage Debentures and £75,000 4½ per cent. Mortgage Debenture Stock, and discharging all the other debts and liabilities of the old Company existing at that date, but reserving to the old Company the balance of profits carried forward in revenue account for the year ended September 30th, 1895, and the profits for the twelve months ending September 30th, 1896, less the interim dividends declared and paid for the half-year ending March 31st, 1896. The old Company also in addition receives the premium on the Preference Shares. The price is payable as to £83,250 by the issue as fully paid of the £50,000 Preference Shares, and £33,250 Ordinary Shares, reserved as above-mentioned, and as to the balance in cash.

The old Company pays all the expenses of forming and registering this Company, and carrying out and completing the sale, including the costs of conveying the properties, stamp duties and fees, printing and advertising, accountant's charges, remuneration to the solicitors (as to which a contract, dated the 5th day of October, 1896, has been made between the old Company and the two firms of solicitors before-named, under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881), and commission for guaranteeing the subscription of the £100,000 Preference Shares, and part of the Ordinary Shares now offered.

The following agreements have been entered into:—

(1) An agreement dated the 5th day of October, 1896, and made between William Yates & Company, Limited (the old Company) of the one part, and John Stubbs, for and on behalf of this Company, of the other part, and a modifying agreement, supplemental thereto and made between the same parties, dated the 13th day of October, 1896.

(2) An agreement dated the 21st day of October, 1896, adopting the agreement of the 5th day of October as modified by the agreement of the 13th day of October, 1896, and made between William Yates & Company, Limited, of the 1st part, the said John Stubbs of the 2nd part, and this Company of the 3rd part; and

(3) An agreement dated the 19th day of October, 1896, and made between the said William Yates & Company of the one part, and The Brewery Purchase and Improvement Company, Limited, of the other part, guaranteeing the subscription of the Capital as before-mentioned.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained at the Offices of the Bankers, Solicitors, and Brokers of the Company.

COPY OF CERTIFICATE OF MESSRS. ASHWORTH, MOSLEY & CO., CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS, MANCHESTER:— "15th October, 1896.

"We have acted as Auditors of William Yates & Co., Ltd, since October, 1893, and we certify that the net profits of the Company for the two years and nine months ended 30th June, 1896, were £63,118 10s. 8d. showing an average of £22,952 3s. 10d. per annum, and that for the nine months ended 30th June, 1896, they were £21,169 2s. 1d., or at the rate of £28,225 9s. 5d. per annum."

"These results are after charging the Profit and Loss Account with, in our opinion, proper depreciation of Brewery Buildings, Plant and Machinery, and after writings off in connection with short leaseholds.

"No deduction has been made for Interest on the Debentures and Debenture Stock, or for Interest on Mortgages, and we have excluded a charge of £1,000 per annum, which had been debited against profits in connection with the expenses of the Debenture Issue, but which will not be a charge against the profits of the proposed new Company. The Interest on the Debentures and Debenture Stock amounts to £8,375 per annum. The dividend on the Preference Shares in the new Company will amount to £7,500 per annum.

"(Signed) ASHWORTH, MOSLEY & CO."

The List of Applications opens on Monday, 26th October, and will be closed on or before Wednesday, 28th October, for Town, and the following day for the Country.

PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring and carrying on the business of Norton & Company, Furniture Manufacturers, Cabinet Makers, General Furnishers, Carpet Factors, Upholsterers, and Decorators now carried on by Mr. John Norton upon extensive and commodious premises in Corporation-street, Cannon-street, and Fore-street, Birmingham.

The business has been established for a period of over forty years in the city of Birmingham. It was for many years carried on by Messrs. Marris & Norton, and it has an extensive and lucrative connection in the Midland Counties and London, in the furnishing, decorating, and equipping of residences, hotels, theatres, and other buildings of every kind, whether public or private.

The spacious fire-proof warehouses and show-rooms are on one of the best sites for business in Birmingham. They have been valued by the well-known firm of Messrs. Farebrother, Ellis, Clark, & Co., and the following is their report:—

"6th August, 1896.

"To the Directors of NORTON & COMPANY, LIMITED.

"Survey and Valuation of Premises situate in Corporation-street, Fore-street, and Cannon-street, in the City of Birmingham, as now in the occupation of the well-known firm of Upholsterers and Art Furnishers, Messrs. Norton & Co., and as shown by the Plan and described in the Schedule attached to this Report.

"Corporation-street is the main business thoroughfare in Birmingham, extending from Stephenson-place and New-street Station to Lancaster-street and the Aston-road. In consequence of its central position, not only with regard to the several Railway Stations, but also to the Commercial Institutions and Municipal Buildings of the City, it has a great commercial value, and is looked upon as the best situation for any trade or financial establishment of importance, and it is seldom that so large an area as that occupied by Messrs. Norton's premises can be obtained. They are held under an Indenture of Underlease for a term of 66¼ years, from the 29th September, 1889, at a Ground Rent of £1,400 per annum.

"Having regard to all the circumstances, we are of opinion that these premises are worth the sum of Forty-two Thousand Pounds (£42,000).

"Farebrother, Ellis, Clark, & Co."

The books of the firm have been investigated by Messrs. Deloitte, Dever, Griffiths, & Co., Chartered Accountants, London, whose report is as follows :—

4, Lothbury, London, E.C., September 2nd, 1896.

"To the Chairman and Directors, J. Norton & Co., Limited.

"Gentlemen,—We have examined the Books of J. Norton & Co., Furniture Manufacturers, &c., of Birmingham, with a view to ascertain the profits for the 3 years, from May 1st, 1893, to April 30th, 1896. In consequence of Stocks not having been taken during the period, we have given such detailed and laborious care to the preparation of these accounts, that we are able to certify in our judgment that the net profits of the period have been £28,800, or an average of £9,600 per annum. We believe the business is a good and sound one, and that if Stocks had been taken, the effect would have been to show increased profits.

"We are, Gentlemen,
"Yours faithfully,
"DELOITTE, DEVER, GRIFFITHS, & CO."

The Vendor has contracted to pay all the costs, charges and expenses of, and in connection with the Company down to and including allotment, and the cost of the transfer of the properties to the Company. The purchase price for the Business Premises, Stock-in-trade and Goodwill is the sum of £90,000, payable partly in cash, and partly in fully paid up Ordinary Shares of the Company.

The working capital will amount to £25,000, of which £15,000 will be Stock-in-trade guaranteed by the Vendor and the remaining £10,000 in cash.

The purchase by the Company is to take effect as from the 31st October, 1896.

The net profits of the business as certified by Messrs. Deloitte, Dever, Griffiths, & Co. are sufficient to pay the dividend on the Preference Shares, and to leave £6,000 available for dividend on the Ordinary Shares, management expenses, &c., as will be seen from the following figures :—

Average net profits for the last three years	£9,600	0	0
Deduct 6 per cent. Interest on £60,000 Preference Shares	3,600	0	0
Leaving a Surplus of ...	£6,000	0	0

It will be seen that, apart from goodwill, the Company will have the following assets :—

Premises, as valued by Messrs. FAREBROTHER, ELLIS, CLARK & CO.	£42,000	0	0
Stock-in-trade	15,000	0	0
Cash	10,000	0	0
	£67,000	0	0

The Directors have arranged with Mr. Norton to occupy the position of Managing Director for a period of three years, from October 31st, 1896.

The following contracts have been entered into :—

(1) A contract dated the 15th September, 1896, and made between John Norton, of the one part, and Richard Robert Weston (the vendor to the Company), of the other part, and an agreement dated the 20th day of October, 1896, endorsed thereon, between the same parties.

(2) A contract dated October 21st, 1896, and made between the said Richard Robert Weston of the one part and the Company of the other part.

The above-mentioned contracts, together with a copy of the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company, and the certificates of the Valuers and Accountants, can be inspected at the Offices of the Solicitor to the Company.

Other agreements or arrangements have been entered into by the Vendor, to which the Company is not a party, with reference to the promotion of the Company and the guaranteeing of its Capital and the application or distribution of the profits, arising from the promotion of the Company, which may constitute contracts within the meaning of Section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867. Applicants for shares shall be deemed to have notice of the existence of such agreements, and to have agreed with the Company as Trustee for the Directors and others to waive their right, if any, to particulars thereof, whether under the said Section, or otherwise, or to any further compliance with the said Section than is contained in this Prospectus, and subscriptions will only be received and allotments made on that footing.

It is intended to apply for a settlement and official quotation for the shares of the Company on the London and Birmingham Stock Exchanges.

Applications for Preference Shares should be made on the form accompanying the prospectus, and forwarded to the Bankers of the Company with the amount of deposit.

If no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full, and where the number of Shares is less than the number applied for, the balance will be applied towards payment due on allotment, and any excess returned to the applicant.

Copies of the Prospectus, with Forms of Application for Shares, can be obtained at the Offices of the Company, or from their Bankers, Brokers, Solicitors, or Auditors.

October 21st, 1896.

The LIST of APPLICATIONS will be CLOSED on or before FRIDAY, the 30th inst., for Town, and SATURDAY, the 31st, for the Country.

THE LONDON WOOLLEN COMPANY (Limited).—

PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed to acquire as a going concern the well-known old-established and prosperous business known as the Wood-street Clothing and Woollen Warehouse (Limited), carried on at the extensive and well-adapted premises situated at Little Love-lane, Wood-street, London, E.C., and to further develop and extend the same.

PARTICULARS OF BUSINESS.

The business, which has been established upwards of a quarter of a century, was originally conducted as a private concern, but was, for convenience, registered in 1890 as a Joint Stock Company, the proprietor holding practically the whole of the Share Capital. It has now been decided to carry on the undertaking as a public company, and to give the numerous customers and others an opportunity of participating in the profits of this lucrative concern.

The business chiefly consists of the manufacture of ready-made and bespoke men's clothing, which is supplied to retailers all over the United Kingdom. About two years ago a department was added for the supply of juvenile clothing, and it is intended to largely extend this branch of the business, for which the Directors are informed there is ample scope.

The premises occupied by the Company (which are fitted with all the necessary appliances for carrying on the trade) consist of two warehouses in Little Love-lane, Wood-street, Cheapside, London, E.C., connected by fireproof compartments, and constructed at considerable cost, the main warehouse consisting of five floors fitted throughout with a Waygood's lift of the latest construction (erected in 1894). The rear Warehouse contains four floors with a Waygood's lift (erected last year). The dock for receiving goods is also fitted with a lift and hoist for loading, worked by an 8-horse-power Crossley's gas-engine in excellent condition, and there is also good strong-room accommodation.

There are commodious Sale and Show Rooms (where the Company employs upwards of 120 cutters, warehousemen, and clerks) for both men's and juvenile trade, and a special feature of the business is the Bespoke Department, in which the Company is acknowledged to be the leading house in the trade for high-class goods.

PROPERTY TO BE ACQUIRED.

The business is conducted with the best class of customers, and is of a very safe nature, as is amply proved by the fact that while the sales for the past 5½ years amount to £660,790 1s. 6d., the total bad debts have been only £1,277 10s. 2d.

The premises, which are most substantially constructed, are held on lease for 80 years, from 24th June, 1888, at a rental of £1,200 per annum, which lease has been valued by Messrs. S. Walker and Runtz, the well-known surveyors and valuers, of Moorgate Street, London, at the sum of £18,000 0 0

While the other assets which are included in the purchase price to the Company at 9th June, 1896, from which the Company takes over the business, consist of stock (after writing off depreciation), valued at 31,499 0 0
Book debts (after deducting discounts) 40,731 13 2
Balance at Bank of England, bills receivable, trade fixtures, &c... 4,538 16 11

Making the total assets to be transferred to the Company..... £94,769 10 1 while the liabilities amounted to only £30,396 17s. 5d.

Out of the present issue an additional £5,000 will be available for working capital, giving the Company a total working capital of upwards of £50,000.

The Company has a large and sound clientèle in the trade, and there is hardly a town in the United Kingdom in which it has not a representative. The customers number many hundreds, and it is proposed to make a liberal allotment amongst them in order to ensure their active co-operation in increasing the turnover of the Company.

VALUER'S REPORT.

The following is a copy of Messrs. S. Walker and Runtz's valuation of the lease:—

22 Moorgate-street, London, E.C., July 27th, 1896.

To the Directors of the Wood-street Clothing and Woollen Warehouse (Limited), 1 Little Love-lane, Wood-street, E.C.

Gentlemen,—In accordance with your instructions we have made a survey of the business premises No. 1 Little Love-lane, Wood-street, in the City of London, situate in the centre of the drapery and clothing trades.

The premises comprise a substantially-erected warehouse of seven floors with a handsome stone front, and a four-storey warehouse in the rear communicating therewith, containing the following accommodation:—

On the Fourth Floor—A large stock-room and cutting-room.
On the Third Floor—Trimming and cutting-room and office.
On the Second Floor—Ware-room and office, with a ware-room in back building approached by corridor.
On the First Floor—A large and handsome show-room, buyers'-room and office, with ware-room in back building approached by corridor.
On the Ground Floor.—Show room and office, workpeople's entrance, with entering room and packing room in building in rear.
In the Basement.—Stock room, receiving room, lift from street, and lavatories, with stock room in building in rear.
Sub-Basement.—Packing room, engine room, strong room, and goods lift from street.

Each building is fitted with a lift from basement to top floor, and they are well lighted front and back; the whole of the before-mentioned premises are in the occupation of the Company.

A further portion of the premises, approached by a separate entrance from the street, comprising:

On the Second Floor.—Stock room;
On the First Floor.—Show room;
On the Ground Floor.—Wareroom and offices, with basement and sub-basement, and lift from street, are let on lease to Mr. A. O. Aldwinckle, for a term of seven years from Lady Day, 1895, on the following terms: the first year £500 per annum; for the second and third years £650 per annum; and the remainder of the Lease £700 per annum. Landlord paying all rates and taxes.

The before-mentioned property is held by lease for a term of 80 years, from the 24th June, 1888, at a ground rent of £1,200 per annum. We are of opinion that the leasehold interest therein is worth the sum of Eighteen Thousand Pounds (£18,000).—Yours faithfully,

S. WALKER and RUNTZ.

ACCOUNTANTS' CERTIFICATE.

The books of the firm have been carefully kept and have been regularly audited by Messrs. Chatteris, Nichols, and Co., the well-known Chartered Accountants, who have given the following certificate:

1, Queen Victoria-street, Mansion House, London, E.C., 27th July, 1896.

We have for some years past annually audited the books of the Wood-street Clothing and Woollen Warehouse (Limited), and certify that after adjusting the accounts in conformity with the rent now payable by the Company, and allowing for a sinking fund to be invested at 3 per cent. per annum, so as to provide for the extinction of the lease, the following were the net profits (including rents received) for each of the undermentioned years, and for the period from the 16th November, 1895, to 6th June, 1896. These results are arrived at after deducting depreciations and bad debts, but without charging Directors' fees or income tax.

	Sales. £	Net profit. £ s. d.

or £7,601 1s. 10d. per annum.

The annual bad debts have averaged less than a fourth of one per cent. upon sales.—We are, yours faithfully,

CHATTERIS, NICHOLS, & Co., Chartered Accountants.

PROFITS.

From this it will be seen that the average net profit for the last five-and-a-half years is £7,601 1s. 10d. per annum, while the profit for the period from 16th November, 1894, to 6th June, 1896 (18 months 20 days), is £14,558 10s. 3d., or at the rate of £9,371 17s. 7d. per annum.

Taking this figure as a basis for future earnings, and without allowing for any increase which it is only reasonable to assume, the following result is shown £9,371 17 7

To pay 4½ per cent. on £40,000 Debenture Stock will require	£1,800 0 0
To pay 6 per cent. on £40,000 Preference Shares will require	2,400 0 0	—£4,200 0 0

CONTRACTS.

The purchase price has been fixed by the vendor, who is the promoter of the Company, at £115,000, payable as to £38,000 in cash, £40,000 in cash or debentures, or part cash and part debentures, and the balance in cash, shares, or debentures, or partly in either, at the option of the directors.

The business will be taken over by the Company from June 6, 1896, and the shareholders will receive the full benefit of the profits from that date.

Mr. Goslin, who has been associated with the business for the past 26 years, has agreed to act as Managing Director of the Company for at least seven years on terms very favourable to the Company, and the whole of the present staff will be taken over by the Company, thus ensuring a continuance of the system which has brought the concern to its present successful position.

The following contracts have been entered into:—Contracts dated 11th July, 1896, and 5th August, 1896, between J. D. Gosling of the one part and T. J. Ford of the other part; contract for sale and purchase, dated 15th October, 1896, between the said T. J. Ford of the one part and J. Fletcher, as trustee on behalf of the Company, of the other part; contract for securing the services of Mr. Goslin as Managing Director, dated 22nd July, 1896, and made between J. D. Goslin of the one part and T. J. Ford of the other part.

Application will be made to the Committee of the London Stock Exchange for a settlement.

The original certificates of the auditors and valuers, the above-mentioned contract for sale and purchase, and copies of the memorandum and articles of association can be seen by intending applicants for shares or Debenture Stock at at the offices of the Solicitors to the Company.

Where no allotment is made the deposit will be returned without deduction, and where the number of shares allotted is less than that applied for, the surplus will be credited in reduction of the amount payable on allotment, and any excess returned to the applicant.

Applications for shares or debentures should be made on the form accompanying the prospectus, or on that at foot, and forwarded to the Company's Bankers together with a remittance for the amount payable on application.

Prospectuses and forms of application can be obtained at the Offices of the Company, and of the Bankers and Brokers.

Dated 22nd October, 1896.

This form should be filled up and forwarded, together with cheque or cash for the amount payable on application, to the Bank of England, Threadneedle-street, London, E.C.
